Students merit hearing before suspension

United Press International
WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court said today two students suspended without a hearing are entitled to damages of up to $1 million because school officials violated their rights.

The court said the students can collect "nominal damages" even if their suspensions were justified if they did not suffer specific personal injury as a result.

But it said to collect larger compensatory damages, students must prove actual injury — such as financial loss or "emotional distress" from an unjustified suspension.

"By making the deprivation of such rights actionable for damages without proof of actual injury, the law recognizes the importance to organized society that the rights be scrupulously observed," said Justice Lewis Powell, writing for the court.

"But at the same time it remains true to the principle that substantial damages should be awarded only to compensate actual injury or in a case of exemplary or punitive damages, to deter or punish multiple deprivations of rights."

The court ruled on consolidated civil rights cases filed in behalf of youths — one suspended during a curious-looking cigarette race, the other for wearing an earring.

Silas Briscoe was suspended 10 days in 1973 from fifth grade class at Barton Elementary School for wearing an earring, denoting membership in the "Boss Pimps" street gang.

Jarius Phipps, a student at Chicago Vocational High School, was suspended for 20 days in 1974 for smoking an "irregularly shaped" cigarette, the principal suspected marijuana.

U.S. District Judge R.W. Merriam declined to award damages against school officials had not acted maliciously. He also refused compensatory damages.

The 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, however, said those civil rights are violated when general compensatory damages inherent in the nature of the wrong even if they fail to establish individual injury or financial loss.

Powell disagreed.

"Rights, constitutional and otherwise, do not exist in a vacuum," he said. "Their purpose is to protect persons from injuries to their interests."
