

Two space craft will go to Venus

United Press International MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. — Two Pioneer space-craft will be launched for Venus between May 20 and Aug. 7 to make the first detailed survey of the cloud planet's atmosphere and surface. Pioneer-Venus is the first project devoted to studying the atmosphere and weather of any planet, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration said. One of the Pioneer-Venus missions will employ a multiprobe that will split into five separate spacecraft. Each is targeted to make measurements from the top of Venus' atmosphere to the surface where it will crash. The other mission is an orbiter, which should circle Venus for a minimum of eight months. The orbiter's 12 scientific instruments will return daily pictures of Venusian clouds, make numerous measurements of the atmosphere and compile radar maps of the surface.
