Cataloging system to be upgraded

An upheaval that will have a profound effect on major college and university libraries lies just around the corner.

Changeover to a new, more efficient materials cataloging system by the Library of Congress will be the cause. The Library of Congress has announced its card catalog will be closed in December 1979.

A new catalog, based on new rules and computerized techniques, will be used beginning Jan. 2, 1980.

Because many research libraries rely on Library of Congress card cataloging for cost reasons, colleges and universities are faced with changes, too.

"It will be traumatic at first, but more efficient in the long run for library patrons and libraries," a Texas A&M University library spokesman said.

Noreen Alldredge of the University's Sterling C. Evans Library said most libraries of 500,000 or more volumes will change with the Library of Congress. For a time, dual catalogs probably will be required.

In that case a scholar, seeking materials on a particular subject, will make two searches. One will be by computer terminal into an on-line catalog and another in the now standard way, by flipping through cards in the card catalog. The latter will be for material catalogued before Jan. 2, 1980.

Eventually, all catalogs will be electronic. But it will take time, Alldredge said.

The major culprit is the "edge explosion." Accelerating research, scholarship and publication recent years makes it difficult to keep up.

The Library of Congress, for example, has not yet caught up with World War I in its 23 million-card catalog.

"Even though libraries are intensive," Alldredge said, "maintaining the present card catalog labor intensive."

Texas A&M libraries will headstart on a possible change to the new Library of Congress system, through cooperation with Ohio College Library Center's system and use of the Automated Retrieval System (AIRS) holdings here have machine-readable form size.

With similar systems provided, if the committee made recommendations accepted by the Council for a changeover, they would go more smoothly, Texas A&M researchers are used to an automatic system maintaining information from on-generated listings such as on output microfiche.

Oceanography prof elected chairman

A Texas A&M University oceanography professor has been elected chairman of the University National Oceanographic Laboratory System (UNOLS) at the group's annual meeting in Washington D.C.

T.K. Treadwell, the new chairman, said UNOLS is composed of all United States universities which operate oceanographic vessels and have major graduate academic programs in oceanography.

Texas A&M helped found the group in 1972, he said.

"We (UNOLS) provide a unified source of information for the federal government on all aspects of sea-going ships, submersibles, equipment, technicians and financial support," Treadwell said.

"It also serves as a scheduler," he continued. "We try to take the process of getting out to sea and utilizing research the most efficient manner."

Treadwell said the major emphasis for the coming year will be establishment of a schedule of modernization and replacement of university-operated oceanographic research fleets. Texas A&M is one of the nation's major research in its fleet.

Treadwell, with federal government agency representatives, is traveling to Washington to present their proposed modernization program before the Oceanographic Committee.
