Prof participates in embryo study

Embryo transfer in cattle has a potential for increasing beef production if research can overcome some of the problems and bring down costs, says a Texas A&M University scientist.

The method allows an embryo to be taken from a high-grade beef cow and implanted in another, permitting greater production of top cattle. Endocrinologist Max Amoss has received a $6,000 contract from Rio Vista Farms of San Antonio to study hormone action in Brahman cattle because of the limited success producers have had in obtaining embryos from this breed.

Currently, embryo transfer is a costly business, running about $1,000 per calf. The technique could be a boon for producers, turning out cattle that would mature at more or less predictable rates, notes Amoss.
