Midnight birds are 'hot to trot'
United Press International
PROVO, Utah — Turkeys are more fertile if they have sex around midnight, says a Brigham Young University scientist.
Dr. N. Paul Johnston said he has been able to maintain 100 percent fertility in experimental groups of turkeys and increase the hatchability of their eggs 25 percent simply by controlling the hours the birds played around with the bees.
Johnston, an associate professor of animal science, was to present his research to the World Poultry Congress which began Wednesday in Rio De Janeiro, Brazil.
The secret to increased fertility and hatchability is the time of insemination, he said. "It's the position of the egg in the oviduct."
In order for sperm to find the egg in proper position in the oviduct, insemination should take place from 18 hours prior to the time the turkey hen lays it, Johnston said.
Seventy percent of turkey eggs are laid in the early afternoon, the ideal time for insemination to occur during the turkey's daily egg is around midnight, said the scientist.
He also said he was able to manipulate the turkey's daily routine using artificial lighting.
The economic impacts of controlling insemination are large, he added.
"A turkey poult is worth one dollar. If you can get a 25 percent increase in the number of poulets produced, that's quite a saving."
Increasing fertility among the Thanksgiving birds is important because a turkey hen's life for breeding purposes is only about five months. They produce only 100 eggs, compared to 270 chicken hens.

Thomas cleared in paternity suit
The jury in a paternity suit named a former Texas A&M University football player, Pat Thomas, as the father of a child in question.
Searcy Louise Toliver of Bryan filed the suit Aug. 1976, asking that the child be established as her son. Thomas' last name was changed to Thomas. The trial took place in 85th District court in Bryan.
