

KANM is back

KANM radio, Texas A&M University's student government station, is back in operation and transmitting in stereo.

The station, which is sent over local cables but is not broadcast, closed in early August with a change in frequencies and content from monophonic to stereo and KANM is now at 99.9 on the FM dial instead of 89.1.

Production manager Todd Gross says the station only sends a signal on the cables for a number of reasons.

"It costs too much and we can't have a license. If we went on the air, we'd have to pay the people who work for us and get everybody a broadcast license from the FCC."

Gross said the station is trying to increase its staff to be able to operate 24 hours a day. Now it is only run 16 to 17, he said.

The station started five or six years ago, Gross said, and was funded entirely by student government. Since then, it has gone to a strictly commercial money-making format, but retains some benefits from the earlier days. Gross says it still has a booth in the Memorial Student Center's student program office, for instance.

U.S. airlines said safest despite San Diego crash

United Press International
FORT WORTH — Despite the recent midair collision of a private plane and an airliner at San Diego, Calif., U.S. airlines are still the safest way to travel, a Federal Aviation Administration official said Thursday.

Jefferson W. Cochran, associate administrator of the FAA's engineering and development office, told Air Traffic Control Association delegates the tragic accident that killed 144 persons "is of course going to affect the safety statistics." But he said the country's safety record was "second to none."

The San Diego accident, no matter what the cause, shows that safety efforts could be better, he said.

Quentin S. Taylor, FAA deputy administrator, opened the morning session of the ATCA conference by telling delegates the association faces "some major safety issues that need to be addressed."

Dr. James J. Kramer, associate administrator for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, said NASA is involved in programs concerning aviation safety.

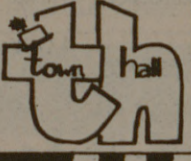

He said NASA is working on projects that could help improve aircraft operations in poor visibility and those involving human error.

Texas court says rape law non-discriminatory to men

United Press International
AUSTIN — The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals has ruled the state's statutory rape law does not discriminate against men.

The appeals courts also reversed a felony conviction given James L. Morgan because the indictment against the Bryan man did not specifically detail the charges against him.

On Oct. 25, 1975, Morgan pleaded guilty to robbing a home and was given a 10-year probated sentence. He was later sentenced to five years in prison for violating probation.

The criminal appeals court reversed the decision, saying that the indictment failed to satisfy all the conditions necessary for conviction of a felony theft.

In another decision Wednesday, the court refused to remove 37 arrests from the record of a Fort Worth man currently serving a 20-year sentence for murder.

Paprskar claimed the arrests should be removed since no indictments followed the arrests and since he was not convicted of a felony in the five years preceding each arrest.

The court, however, ruled that it had no jurisdiction to expunge the arrests since there were no criminal penalties attached to the Fort Worth court order denying Paprskar expunction of the arrests.
