Living with the law

Yesterday I got three traffic tickets. One has my name spelled wrong, the second gave the wrong color and year for my car. The officer forgot to sign the last ticket. Do I have to pay the fines?

When you and your car are identified with slight errors, usually identification will not be uncertain enough to invalidate the ticket. You do, however, have a constitutional right to confront witnesses against you. Be sure to appear in court as you have promised by signing the ticket.

Carter signs ethics bill for U.S. officials

United Press International
WASHINGTON — President Carter signed a federal ethics bill Thursday that requires public financial disclosures from the top 14,000 government officials, including the president, vice president, members of Congress and the Supreme Court.

Other aspects of the bill include: —Setting up a permanent authorization for a special prosecutor's office to look into allegations of misconduct by the president, vice president or senior White House officials.

—Creation of an Office of Government Ethics for the executive branch to handle complaints or questions. The director would be a presidential appointee whose nomination would require Senate confirmation.

—Restrictions on job activities after an official leaves the government. For one year after government service ends, a former member of the executive branch could not lobby in the agency worked for.

—Establishment of a Senate legal counsel to aid members of the Senate in legal matters.

The House decided to wait until further study was made before committing itself to such an office.
