Planet's rings are rocklike

United Press International
PASADENA, Calif. — Uranus, the rings around the planet Saturn, are not made of ice crystals but are probably some sort of rocklike material.

Using reflected sunlight, astronomers at the California Institute of Technology last week revealed the first direct picture of the newly discovered rings around the planet.

The picture confirmed that the full rings of material and their radii ranging from nearly 27,000 miles to more than 30,000 miles with widths from 1.8 miles to 60 miles. They are narrow compared to the rings of Saturn which have widths about 30,000 miles.

The picture of the very faint rings was the final result of a complex procedure, in which data from several scans of the planet were transformed into a television-type picture of the rings by computer, scientists said.

The scientists, who obtained the picture when the planet was 1.6 billion miles from Earth, were team member Keith Matthews, Professor Gerry Neugebauer and planetary science graduate student Bill Nicholson.
