Winter: Did we learn to cope?

"Forty-Second Street Mary" could feel winter coming in the freezing rain that soaked through her tennis shoes and the chilling wind that pierced her tattered red coat.

"For the first time this year, I dread sleeping out there tonight. I guess that means winter's here," said Mary, one of the hundreds of homeless "shopping bag ladies" who live a beggar's existence on New York City's streets.

From the California orange groves to the Christmas tree farms in New York, from the Dakota prairies to South Texas' semitropical Rio Grande Valley, winter is closing in on Americans.

Have we learned any lessons from the past two successive vicious winters? Are we more determined this year to cope with the cold storms that last year caused more than 100 weather-related deaths in the Northeast?

Apparently so — especially business and government — a UPI survey of some of the areas hardest hit by last year's winter indicates.

Industry officials are optimistic, buoyed by predictions this winter will be abnormally mild for much of the country.

The National Weather Service forecast calls for a mild winter for much of the eastern half of the country and colder than usual weather in the Northern Great Plains, the Northern Rockies, the Great Basin and the Pacific Northwest as far down as central California.

Those who put their faith in the Old Farmer's Almanac are in for extra pairs of long johns. The almanac calls for a cold winter in the East, the South and the western parts of the country and a winter only in the Rocky Mountains and far western states.

Natural gas companies are optimistic about their supplies for the winter. In fact, one source in Houston, who asked to be identified, said there is a glut of natural gas on the market.

Those predictions are good — especially in areas like where many people shiver with shortages in the past two winters.

In New York City and in both hard-hit by last year's storms, officials said the expected valuable knowledge dealing with future blizzards they said there was no way to for a storm that would only along once or twice a century.

Vito Turso, a spokesman for York City's Sanitation Department, said the city purchased 500 garbage collection trucks that are fitted with snowplows.

A marketing manager in Chicago said national snow shovels, snow tires and are up from last year. One he said, is the southward spread of the "snowbelt."
