Cruel 'savior'—one more cult

The history of Charles Dederich is becoming a familiar tale; it is the story of an odd California messiah and his beleaguered believers, and of power over human minds.

Like the others who are making the type a staple of American headlines, he began as a savior, apparently driven to help the wretched people.

They flocked to him, followed him and built an empire for him — Synanon. Fame and charisma brought converts by the hundreds.

But like the others, after the years of idealistic striving came the years of increasing strangeness. The empire retreated into closed communities, physical and philosophical fortresses.

The 20-year history of Synanon is the story of Charles Dederich, a beefy, pug-nacious-looking man of blunt charm.

In recent years he called Synanon, which began as a treatment for dope addicts, "religion with a small 'r.'" He called himself, perhaps jokingly, "the pope of Synanon."

Former members, many of whom had devoted years of their lives to living in and building Synanon communes, are the most vociferous critics of the group today and the source of most of the stories of bizarre behavior in the cult.

Their stories include obligatory head-shaving for both men and women, compulsory divorces, marriages, abortions, sterilizations and vasectomies, a paramilitary force of reported 150 "imperial marines," arsenals of guns, and vengeance attacks on lists of enemies and former members.

Although he announced his retirement as "board chairman" earlier this year, saying his daughter, Judy, 27, was taking over, former members said he was still the most powerful voice in the group.

Dederich, raised a Catholic in Toledo, Ohio, came to California in the mid-1940s and spent 10 years as an alcoholic. When he sobered up in 1956 through Alcoholics Anonymous, he went forth to save others as he had been saved.

From the AA method of self-confrontation and Dederich's lectures and dressing-downs evolved "the game," the core of the Synanon experience.

It worked only too well.

Synanon, tax exempt and supported by hundreds of enthusiastic workers, swiftly grew very wealthy, opening gas stations, a bakery and other businesses.

Its new chic status brought in a whole new type of member.

These members were not addicts. They were persons, sometimes whole families and often from affluent backgrounds, who had watched "the game" in fascination and wanted to get into the game and the communal life.

Then Synanon bought ranches north of San Francisco and set up closed communities.

The group began changing in many ways, former members said.

By late 1977, Dederich said publicly that the group had amassed $63,000 in guns and was training a 150-man security force to deal with hostile "outsiders."

"Non-violence was a position," he told a news conference. "We can change positions any time we want to."

Police and news organizations began receiving complaints from ex-members that they feared for their lives. Some said they had been beaten. Synanon launched a wave of lawsuits against news organizations.

Spiders' webbing coats town

United Press International

BRIDGE CITY, La. — A spider web had never seen anything like it.

The shower of white, thread-like stuff was falling from sky onto his service station on west bank of the Mississippi River.

"It looks like cotton candy," he said. "When you walk out you get all over you. You can see it in the air."

"It's just in globs. I got a truck here and it's got it on its windshield. It's getting thicker and thicker. Have telephone wires and it's one big spider web."

A sheriff's spokesman, who had seen the phenomenon before, identified the mysterious strands as being spun by "migrating spiders."

"What they do is climb to the top of the tree to mate, spin one three 6 to 20 feet long and then they act as a parachute to carry the spider through the sky," the spokesman said. "They go for miles. One spider web will carry them 100 miles above the earth."

The spokesman said high winds during the past few days may have blown the webs to one spot. He said the spiders are almost invisible.

"A lot of times a spider will lodge his webs," he said. "Even in the cars they are so small you can't see them. Last night I was sitting outside my house and I had a beautiful sight to see the light shining on them."
