Journey's end

Senior Rusty Phelps of San Antonio was one of 18 Corps of Cadets members who relayed a game ball to coach Tom Wilson from the Aggie bonfire to Memorial Stadium in Austin last week. Each runner carried the ball 6.5 miles. The run started Thursday at 8:15 p.m. and ended Friday at 10:25 p.m.

Profs oppose 'discrimination'

The mandatory retirement age of all employees of the Texas A&M University System, except for tenured faculty members, will be boosted from 65 to 70 on Jan. 1. Some professors say they feel that exception is discriminatory.

Dr. Donald S. Moore, a retired agriculture economics professor, said retirement age should depend on the physical and mental health of the teacher.

He also said that he feels teachers have been discriminated against by the new policy. "I think teachers should have the same alternatives as everyone else," he said.

Dr. J.A. Dabbs, a professor of modern languages who is near retirement age, said retirement age should depend on the individual teacher.

Dr. Carl Landiss, 65, head of the Health and Physical Education Department, said he agrees with 65 as the age to retire, but that it should depend on the individual.

He said that positions held by retirement aged people should be opened up for younger people. "I don't feel bad about not staying on fulltime," Landiss said.

He added that he thought part-time positions were good because it created a transitional period from fulltime work to fulltime retirement.

Landiss said he thought non-tenured professors were allowed to work longer because they do not have to motivate students or show as much enthusiasm as teachers.

Tenure of faculty members is determined by such things as area of specialization, level of teaching and researching skills, and compatibility with students and other faculty.

Tenured employees will have to retire at age 65 until July 1, 1982. They will be allowed to work part-time or fulltime until they become 70 if approved by the administration.
