Animals, dancers, band add to Blackstone's magic

By ROY BRAGG
Battalion Staff

The Blackstone Magic Show had a little of everything: comedy, song and dance, magic, and more magic. In addition to a magic show, he also brought a seven-piece band and 10 dancers to give the show more depth than most magic shows have.

His entourage also included a three-ton elephant to set the mood for a circus trick. He used both the elephant and a mule, in one act, in a salute to America in which the animals symbolized the two-party system. That was as intellectual as the show got, thank goodness.

He also used every magician's favorites — rabbits. No, he didn't pull the rabbits out of a hat. The rabbits didn't even get near a hat. Too bad.

The larger tricks, utilizing large props and numerous assistants, couldn't compare with the smaller ones.

During most of the smaller tricks, Blackstone invited members of the audience onstage. This allowed Blackstone to unleash a barrage of one-liners at them. Blackstone isn't the funniest guy in the world, but he did have some good lines.

Blackstone also joined the ranks of performers who have discovered that at Texas A&M, there is no difference between a football game and a night at the theater. As usual, the audience hissed and whooped its way out of a performer's heart and onto his nerves.

Review

His best trick of the night [illegible] in which 14 members of the audience climbed on stage. After ing one man's watch, wallet without his knowing it, Blac asked them to tie his hands.

After being tied up for minutes, Blackstone asked guests on stage to check the While they did so, he lift guy's watch again. After h asked them to check the again, but now his hands we After satisfactory inspect again asked them again no hands! He finally ended the freeing himself and then taking a neck-tie, but a shi one them.

Blackstone's larger trick good, but weak; sometimes almost embarassing. In a l trick, the bar used to lift the was visible. In another, a nary tactic to make the look away from the involv failed completely.
