Arkansas' House OKs visitation bill

United Press International
 LITTLE ROCK, Ark.— The Arkansas House has voted to prohibit members of the opposite sex from visiting in college and university dormitory rooms as "a matter of morality."

The bill, approved 72-10 Tuesday, now goes to the Senate.
 House Speaker John Miller, sponsor of the bill, told the Education Committee the ban probably would have prevented two University of Arkansas dormitory incidents that resulted in bowl game suspensions of Razorback football players.

In December 1977, three Razorback players were suspended from the Orange Bowl squad after a coed complained she had been raped in an athletic dormitory room. A similar incident occurred again in December 1978.

Miller's bill makes it unlawful for any state-supported college or university to permit someone to visit the room of a person of the opposite sex at any time.

"This is a matter of morality," Miller said, referring back to fallen civilizations. "The downfall of great nations was when they let their morals go to such a low ebb."

Rep. Jody Mahony, D-El Dorado, disagreed saying persons old enough to vote and fight in combat were old enough to decide their own moral standards.

Business pact argued

United Press International
 WASHINGTON — A new trade agreement sought by the administration and still being negotiated in Geneva has been attacked by angry congressmen as a "betrayal" of American minority and small business interests.

Robert Strauss, the president's special trade representative, heatedly denied the criticisms in a meeting with the House Small Business Subcommittee on Minority Enterprise Tuesday.

Strauss said the administration will be certain the impact of the agreement on minority and small business "is not negative before any final approval of the codes or the entire agreement is given."

Many members were upset because the agreement would open to foreign competition some U.S. government procurement contracts now reserved for domestic minority and small businesses.

"If this scenario is allowed to stand, it represents a betrayal of minority business," Rep. Parren Mitchell, D-Md., a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, told Strauss.

"While I may be guilty of many things, betrayal is not one of them," Strauss said.

Subcommittee Chairman John LaFalce, D-N.Y., said small American firms would have to compete with subsidized foreign firms which have cheaper sources of labor.

But Strauss said only 7 percent of the $5 billion in U.S. government procurement contracts earned for small and minority businesses would be vulnerable to foreign competition.

He said only countries permitted American firms to compete in government procurement contracts could participate in U.S. procurement programs. Foreigners would be excluded from national security procurement contracts and Pentagon purchases of certain goods and services.

American businesses for the time would be able to bid on an estimated $20 billion worth of European and Japanese procurement programs, he said.

"But it's only an opportunity, a guarantee contracts would be awarded," Mitchell said.

"But what we have done is to exclude, exclude," U.S. government procurement areas from foreign bidding, Strauss said, banging his fist on a table.

"But you have included, included jobs for multinationals which will be awarded to their seas branches," Mitchell said.

"I wouldn't be worth my salt didn't stand up here and fight this, because I am right and I am right," Strauss shouted.
