

State senators end 'detente'

United Press International
AUSTIN — Sen. A.R. "Babe" Moore, D-Galveston, describes Sen. Bill Moore, D-Bryan, as his natural enemy and said the peace pact between them has ended. Schwartz and Moore made headlines last Monday with a verbal assault while on the Senate floor that almost ended in fistfuffs. During the exchange, which centered around Schwartz' demand to interrogate a witness before the State Affairs Committee where Moore is chairman, Schwartz called Moore a fool and Moore countered by saying Schwartz was a fool. The altercation ended with Moore slamming his gavel to adjourn the committee meeting and storming toward Schwartz.

Schwartz, the only reason you're getting away with that is you know I won't hit you. You're too damned small," Moore said, shaking his finger in the smaller senator's face. This most recent battle between conservative Moore and liberal Schwartz, who are first and second, respectively, in Senate seniority, began earlier Monday when Schwartz criticized a Moore bill that would exempt contractors from certain liabilities on projects for cities, counties and other government agencies. But the war between the two began 19 years ago.

"Bill Moore and I are natural enemies by virtue of our personalities and attitudes and motivations," Schwartz said Wednesday. "The best that Bill Moore and I have been able to do since I came here in 1960 is engage in a detente from about '71 until day before yesterday."

Schwartz said serious damage would be done to the legislative process if committee chairmen are given the right to determine which senators may question witnesses. Schwartz, who is not a member of the State Affairs Committee where the fight occurred, asserted that as a member of the Senate he has a right to question any witnesses before any committee.

"It's my position if we ever got into the shape where a committee had to grant the member the right to interrogate witnesses at a committee where he was not a member, that would effectively destroy the ability of an elected state official to operate in the interest of his district," said Schwartz, who has introduced a bill to guarantee senators the questioning right.

Honors classes listed for fall

Pre-registration for the fall 1979 University Honors Program will be held in conjunction with regular fall semester pre-registration April 16-20 at Texas A&M University.

Qualifying students will have a larger choice than ever this year with 19 departments offering 30 courses in 52 Honors sections. Many of the Honors sections are appropriate as both required courses and electives outside a student's field of study.

Courses added to the Honors Program for the first time this fall will include Accounting 327 (Intermediate Accounting), Business Analysis 217 (Business Data Processing Concepts), Biochemistry 302 (Food and Man), Landscape Architecture 240 (History of Landscape Architecture), Mathematics 253 (Engineering Mathematics III), Marketing 321 (Marketing), Spanish 105 (Beginning Spanish) and Renewable Natural Resources 205 and 215 (Fundamentals of Ecology and Fundamentals of Ecology with Laboratory, respectively).

To qualify for an Honors section, a student must have a grade point ratio of 3.0 or above. Students interested in registering for the special courses should make sure their adviser places them in sections with the "H" suffix and a 200-level section number. (Students entering Texas A&M for the first time are placed in Honors sections on the basis of SAT scores and high school records.)

Honors sections hold several advantages for students. Among these are smaller class sizes, outstanding instructors, a more stimulating class environment, a somewhat broader treatment of materials and Honors Student classification on records such as college transcripts, according to University Honors Program Director Dr. B. L. Shapiro.

A survey of last fall's Honors sections revealed that 79 percent of those enrolled receive either A's or B's, and a total of 92 percent receive A's, B's or C's.

In addition to the previously named new "H" courses, Honors sections are being offered this fall in Biology 113 and 123, Chemistry 101, 111 and 227, Economics 203 and 323, Environmental Design 149, English 104 and 301, Genetics 301, History 105 and 106, Management 363, Mathematics 121 and 151, French 101, Physics 201, Political Science 206 and 207 and Psychology 107.

Additional information on Honors sections is available from departmental advisers or from the Office of the University Honors Program, Chemistry Building Room 120.
