South Texas coal high in radiation

United Press International
HOUSTON — The radiation content of lignite from South Texas is especially high and power plants using the coal can emit doses of radiation far higher than those from nuclear power plants, a university energy research specialist Monday.

Dr. Hal B.H. Cooper Jr., in an annual meeting of the American Institute of Chemical Engineers, said that radioactivity from burning Texas lignite because of the presence of trace amounts of uranium and thorium in the grade coal.

Cooper, chief of environmental studies at the University of Texas Center for Energy Studies, said that radiation content is higher in Texas lignite because of the presence of mining quantities of uranium. North Texas lignite, he said, is lower in radiation content than U.S. coal generally.

He said plans to mine 600,000 tons of Texas lignite per year in 1985 showed more study needed to determine the radiation problems.

Cooper said his research showed a person 500 meters downwind from a power plant burning South Texas lignite would be exposed to 5.9 millirems of radiation per year compared to an annual dose of 5.9 millirems from a coal-burning nuclear plant or 9.9 millirems from a coal-burning plant burning North Texas lignite.

Disposing of coal wastes sludge and ash could cost $500,000 a year for disposal of 2000, Cooper said.

Outstanding Spring Announcements

Name The Organization Contest

Representatives from OSA and Hassle-Free have been meeting each Thursday since Feb. 8 to work on the merger between the two organizations. Debbie May, Bruce Martin and Debbie Upmore from OSA and Mike Pettus, Cindy Corn and Frank Krenek from HF, with Jaime Hemphill as chairman, have devised a single-constitution proposal that would serve the purposes of both groups — to serve the off campus students. The proposal has been approved by both organizations.

At the remaining meetings the constitution will be polished and a name will be chosen for the organization from the contest entries submitted in the by April 12 at 5:00. Entries can be submitted in either the Off-Campus Center or the MSC. Prizes include certificates to Last National Bank and Pelican's Wharf.
