Liquor industry takes labeling issue to court

United Press International
WASHINGTON — Proposed regulations that would let beer, wine and liquor drinkers know what's in the bottle through ingredient listing on the label are under a new attack in court from distillers and wine makers.

This time the industry contends one government agency somehow forced a second agency to push the project. To prove its point the industry has submitted testimony from the former head of one of the agencies involved, who now happens to work for the liquor industry.

The proposal to require ingredient labeling on alcoholic beverages was issued two months ago by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, part of the Treasury Department.

The industry took the matter to court and Judge James Gordon of the U.S. District Court in Owensboro, Ky., issued an order late last week telling the bureau and the Food and Drug Administration they must appear next week to justify what they are doing or be held in contempt.

The distillers, wine makers and their trade associations are working behind the scenes to coerce the bureau into a violation of a previous order.

During the Nixon-Ford administration the bureau considered, but rejected, an ingredient labeling proposal. The man who then headed the agency, Rex Davis, is now the president of the National Alcohol Beverage Industry.

One of the groups involved in the latest court action. Davis filed an affidavit in court testifying that he indeed tried to force the labeling on the project. The Spirits Council of the United States, says Davis' affidavit is part of its case.

The businesses involved include such names as James Seagram, Paul Masson, the Institute and Fleishman, who contended the FDA is violating liquor already through guidelines for producing less than 7 percent mostly cooking sherry like.

The FDA said it regulates products as a food because the bureau does not classify them as booze. At the time the bureau proposed it as unnecessary, it inconsistent with the bureau's attempt to reduce by less regulation.
