U.S. has chance to see Japanese modern culture

United Press International
WASHINGTON — The United States and Japan have formally inaugurated a three-month celebration of the arts and culture of modern Japan, one of America's most important but least understood allies.

Called "Japan Today," the event opening Tuesday evening marks the greatest effort ever undertaken to bring about greater understanding between the two economic superpowers and former World War II enemies.

Mention Japan, and most Americans think of Toyota or Datsun cars, Sony color television sets, stereos, and transistor radios. Many also think of the second world war. Both U.S. and Japanese officials want to change that.

They want Americans to see beyond Japanese statistics, economic charts and graphs, and adverse trade balances, and grasp a better understanding of Japan's modern culture.

So, for the next three months, major exhibitions of modern Japanese art, films, music, dance, drama and panel discussions are scheduled to be held in Washington, New York, Boston, Chicago, Denver, Los Angeles and Miami.

Special events also are planned in other American communities including contemporary Japanese print exhibitions in Aspen, Colo. and Indianapolis, and Kobo Abe Theater Troupe performances in St. Louis.

But trade is a major part of modern Japanese culture, too. So there will be trade seminars in Orlando, Fla.; Des Moines, Iowa; Canton, Ohio; Honolulu; Kansas City, and New York.

The exclusive, invitation-only opening festivities began at the prestigious National Academy of Sciences with an address by Mrs. Sadako Ogata, Japan's envoy extraordinary, in its United Nations mission.

In her inaugural address, Ogata said that although there is a long tradition of friendly relations between Japan and the United States, "there are misconceptions in both countries about each other's societies that could lead to serious strains."

She said the United States has been so successful it believes its virtues should be universally accepted. Japan, on the other hand, has remained basically insular despite its vast international economic power.

UPI service to offer world news in home

United Press International
NEW YORK — The world news report of United Press International will become available to owners of home computers under an agreement between UPI and Telecomputing Corp. of America, UPI President Roderick W. Beaton announced Wednesday.

"This marks UPI's entry into an exciting new market," Beaton said. "UPI has pioneered many new service developments in its 72 years and we are pleased to lead the way into this field."

Beaton said details of the new service, including its cost to home buyers, would be announced in June at the American Newspaper Publishers Association Research Institute at Las Vegas and at the National Computer Conference in New York.

Robert F. Ryan, president of TCA, said UPI's full news service will be delivered at high speed on a TCA computer at Silver Spring, Md. Home computer users will be able to connect with the computer by dialing a local telephone number in most cities in the United States. Once connected with the computer, the home user will be able to call items of particular interest by punching simple codes on a keyboard.

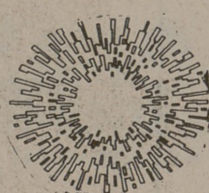

TCA will also provide series of home computers such as electronic mail, business packages and a library of 2,000 programs.
