'Shopsteading'
Pioneers back

BALTIMORE — When the coordinator of Baltimore's shopsteading program looks at a row of tired three-story brick buildings along West Baltimore Street, she envisions something else: An ice cream shop here, a beauty shop there, a doctor's office, a picture framing shop, an Oriental gift shop — even a pottery shop with a kiln in back.

To Kathleen C. Deasy, it is a bustling urban village with shopkeepers living above their stores as they did at the turn of the century.

"We're providing a way for the small business person to get started in a very supportive atmosphere," she said.

In December 1977, Baltimore began a "shopsteading" project. It is patterned after the city's successful homesteading program, which allows prospective homeowners to buy vacant city-owned houses for $1 if they promise to renovate and live in them.

Under shopsteading, stores in buildings the city acquired through tax sales or block grant money are available for $100 in several once-thriving commercial districts.

Merchants must agree to renovate their property, bring it up to building code requirements, and operate a business for at least two years before it can be sold privately.

The city offers shopsteaders low-interest, long-term rehabilitation loans and free commercial counseling to help them take advantage of tax breaks and other loan programs.

The city benefits because neighborhoods are upgraded, 40 buildings that have been vacant for years go back on the tax rolls and small business gets a boost.

Baltimore offers shopsteaders 7 percent, 20-year loans, which are supported by bond issues. It will lend them 100 percent of the cost of renovation, if the appraised value of their rehabilitated property is 120 percent of that cost.

Most shopsteaders borrow about $65,000, Deasy said. Renovation costs average about $25,000 per floor.

"We find the people getting into this are real pioneers. The pioneers are no longer in the West, they're in downtown Baltimore," Deasy said.

She led a group of prospective shopsteaders through the West Baltimore Street neighborhood known

Ecuador leader to work for need

QUITO, Ecuador — Jaime Roldos, a 38-year-old lawyer with administrative experience, Monday won presidential election Sunday balloting.

"I am not going to forget a single Ecuadorian, but I am going to care more for those who are most needy," the moderate leftist Roldos said in an early morning interview after winning Sunday balloting.

"I give thanks to the humble people of my country, those who live in the towns and along all the roads of Ecuador shouted 'Roldos, president of the poor people,' because their time has come."

With more than 63 percent of the votes counted, Roldos held an unbeatable 2-1 margin over former Quito Mayor Sixto Duran Roldos and Duran were the only candidates to survive a preliminary ballot held June 16, 1978.

Roldos served two years as a national legislator but has virtually no administrative experience. His party, the Concentration of Forces, is a populist group with wide appeal but few figures in national stature.

In his campaign Roldos combined attacks on the landowners and merchants who have dominated Ecuador for generations with promises of social justice and economic development.

Roldos will be inaugurated Aug. 10 for a five-year term as Ecuador's 44th and youngest president, along with vice president Osvaldo Hurtado, 39.

The makeup of the 69-member, single-chamber legislature elected Sunday was still in doubt, pending tallies involving more than 1,000 candidates from 12 parties.
