Meyer nominated for top Army job

United Press International
WASHINGTON — In a move that took the military hierarchy by surprise, President Carter announced Wednesday that he is nominating Lt. Gen. Edward "Shy" Meyer to be Army chief of staff over a number of more senior officers.

The White House announcement followed reports from Pentagon sources that Carter has selected Meyer to be the Army's top general with promotion to four-star rank.

When confirmed by the Senate, the 50-year-old Meyer will be one of the youngest officers ever to hold the Army's top uniformed job. An articulate and intellectual West Pointer, he is said to have impressed Carter and reportedly was sought for the post by Army Secretary Clifford Alexander.

Meyer will succeed Gen. Bernard Rogers, who is moving to Europe as the supreme commander of NATO forces next month.

Although he had been considered a dark horse candidate for the chief of staff job, Meyer was named last month as the next commander of Army forces in Europe. That post would have brought him his fourth star anyway, but the announcement was widely thought to have taken him out of the running for the chief's job.

Carter's choice jumps Meyer over four four-star generals who were considered likely candidates for the top post, as well as another two four-stars who are not yet ready for retirement. He is also passing nine other three-star generals who are senior to him in rank.

Aspirin does go for head

United Press International
CHICAGO — An aspirin may prevent heart attacks caused by plugged arteries, a Michael Reese Hospital researcher says.

Previous studies have shown aspirin doses can decrease incidence of recurring heart strokes. But Dr. Ruth search, published in the Clinical Investigation, daily doses may prevent heart attacks by preventing plaque from building up. "It would be nice to prevent heart attacks by taking an aspirin a day," the researcher says. "But we are not there yet."

Her findings were from a six-month experiment with cynomolgus monkeys. The monkeys were fed a high fat diet, which usually causes plaque to build up inside wall of arteries. The monkeys were given aspirin at the end of the study.

An examination six months later showed the coronary arteries of those monkeys who took daily aspirin were about as clear as those of the monkeys on a normal diet.

Pick said the aspirin substance which makes platelets slippery, prevents them from sticking to the vessel plaque or to each other.

The plaque normally clogs blood vessels, which can grow and narrow. Then the blood vessels are starved of oxygen and die. When the heart muscle dies, the result is a stroke.

Pick also speculated that aspirin's ability to thin blood vessels might help smokers who take the drug to reduce their heart problems.

She also plans research to determine the best daily dose. She said that aspirin and other drugs can result in stomach bleeding, even stomach bleeding.
