Contract needed before marriage, Steiger testifies

United Press International
LOS ANGELES — Actor Rod Steiger, the latest to be caught up in a "Marvin-type" lawsuit, testified that the cost of his first two marriages was so big he never would have married his third wife if she had agreed to renounce all future financial claims if the marriage broke up. It did, and she wants half his earnings, saying she was pressured into signing the agreement just before the wedding without realizing what she was doing.

Steiger, 54, said he never would have married Sherry Nelson, 41, horse race handicapper, if she had not signed the prenuptial agreement "because of the unfortunate circumstances of my two previous marriages."

They were married in 1973 and Mrs. Steiger is claiming half the $600,000 a year she said he made during the marriage.

But they had lived together for three years before the marriage and she is also claiming a share of his earnings during that period, claiming a "Marvin-type agreement," named for the legal precedent set in a suit brought by actor Lee Marvin's former mistress.

Mrs. Steiger testified that she was not presented with the proper rights renunciation until after invitations to their wedding had been mailed and the ceremony was only a few days off.

Steiger told her the agreement was only a formality, she said.

She complained that after her own attorney refused to handle the matter, she was supplied an attorney, Louis Petrich, from a firm he also worked for Steiger's film company. She complained of conflicts of interest.

Petrich, summoned by subpoena to respond, denied the charge, saying he carefully explained to her that "it was a very serious step she was taking."

"I told her Mr. Steiger was a successful actor and she would not be entitled to any of his earnings," the attorney said. "I told her I would tell her what the legal effect of the document was and she would have to make the decision."
