'Gas jockey' plan fails in Houston

United Press International
HOUSTON — A few weeks ago the lines at gasoline stations were long and growing longer and Sue Thompson's plan for The Gas Jockeys seemed like a good idea. Thompson's Gas Jockeys were offering to do your waiting in gas lines for busy motorists. Now that gas lines have disappeared because of increased refining, odd-even rationing and re-adjustments in the federal allocation program, the firm is out of business. "I thought the gas lines would last longer than they did," said Thompson, a personnel counselor looking for some side income. "They were so great for a time, you know, blocks long." The idea was this: for $10 and the price of the gas, The Gas Jockeys would take your car to a service station and sit in line waiting for gas in your place. Thompson put an ad in the paper for drivers. She thought it was an opportunity for housewives, part-time workers, students, anyone looking for additional income. Then she advertised for customers. She recruited 98 jockeys and 50 customers. "And those we got were so few and far between — they were scattered all over the city," she said. By the end of July, less than a month after the company started, Miss Thompson said the company had spent $4,000 more than it had taken in, mostly on advertising. She said similar companies in other parts of the country have succeeded despite ups and downs in gasoline shortages. "If we'd been able to keep the jockeys busy in their own areas, we might have made it," Thompson said. "But it just wouldn't have been profitable for them to be driving long distances for a few customers."
