Carter asked to order workers back to jobs

Farm Bureau President Allan Grant sent a telegram to the White House as talks Tuesday between Rock Island, one of the nation's major grain haulers, and two striking unions failed to show any movement toward ending the walk-outs.

Grant said farmers are bearing the burden of the strike as they move into a critical autumn harvest period, adding that on-farm and commercial storage is not adequate to handle the massive amounts of grain moving from the fields.

He said farmers are facing the prospect of being unable to move their products to market "and will be forced to dump grain on the ground."

Both Fred Kroll, president of the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks, and Fred Hardin, president of the United Transportation Union, met with Rock Island officials Tuesday at the headquarters of the National Mediation Board, but little progress was reported.

The key issue in dispute for both unions has been the railroad's refusal to grant retroactive pay increases, along the lines of the recently negotiated agreements with most other major railroads.

The Rock Island operates in 13 states and is one of the nation's major grain haulers, carrying an estimated annual load of more than $3 billion.

But federal officials have refused a company request to order a 60-day "cooling off" period on the grounds the strike has created a national emergency.

A Kroll spokesman described Rock Island's position as "refusal to negotiate, no change in its position against retroactivity, and announcement that if workers wanted to come back to work, they would have to work under rules promulgated by the company."

"It doesn't look like any movement at all," he said. "The meeting has been recessed without any further date. The status quo prevails."

The railway and airline clerks struck Aug. 25.

Inmates exercise green thumbs

United Press International

SOUTH BURLINGTON, Vt. — Officially, it's known as "horticultural therapy." The inmates simply call it a "good deal."

Whatever it's called, the garden they planted this year outside the walls of the Chittenden Community Correctional Center has become the talk of the prison.

"The idea is that planting, nurturing and harvesting a garden satisfies a primal need and helps prisoners gain self confidence and self esteem," said Nancy Flinn, 38, a mother of four who started the program last spring.

First, she talked correction officials into trying the idea, then convinced the University of Vermont to loan a 3 1/2-acre alfalfa field nearby.

Nearly a dozen inmates volunteered to work part time in the field, and Flinn convinced CETA officials to pay four prisoners $3.25 an hour to cultivate vegetables.

The prison brigade planted 800 tomato plants, 700 pounds of potatoes and a dozen rows of corn, but initial enthusiasm was lagging.

"I hated this garden at first. I hated it because I had to be here, hated everything about prison," said Rick Brown, 32.

"Now, I'd have to say it helped me," he said as he harvested a 200-foot row of yellow beans.

"It's not working in the garden per se, but all the things that go with it — all the pats on the back we've gotten, the people we've met," he said.

Brown, serving a one-year sentence, is due for release this month. His sentence reduced by "good time" earned in part in the garden. The other prisoners working in the garden were nearing the end of their terms.

Prison guard Brent Baker, who supervised the garden, said that had been only one security problem — a woman inmate who escaped and was caught an hour later.

The only other law enforcement problem put prisoners at the receiving end of a crime — an overnight thief cleaned out eight rows of potatoes.

"You never saw anybody get mad until you've seen a bunch of prisoners who have been ripped off," one observer said.

Anti-Davis witness says he lied on tape

United Press International

FORT WORTH — David McCrory told a T. Cullen Davis attorney "what he wanted to hear" — rather than the truth — the prosecution witness has testified.

A tape of the conversation between attorney Steve Sumner and McCrory was played for the jury Tuesday in Davis' murder-for-hire trial.

After it was played, McCrory testified that he had lied to Sumner several times on the tape.

"I was telling him what he wanted to hear," McCrory said under cross examination by Davis' lead defense attorney, Richard "Racehorse" Haynes.

McCrory said that he figured the testimony he gave Sumner would get back to Davis and "give me some breathing room," so that Davis would stop pressuring him about having people killed.

Davis is charged with trying to force McCrory to hire someone to kill Davis' divorce judge, Joe Eidson. McCrory, however, was working with the FBI and no one was hurt in the alleged plot.

McCrory said he believed he was being taped at the time because Sumner always taped interviews.

Haynes scored a few points on cross examination, pointing out minor inconsistencies in McCrory's testimony in the trial, as well as testimony given in the previous trial in Houston, which ended in a hung jury, and in a bond hearing for Davis in Fort Worth.

31 indictments filed in welfare fraud cases

United Press International

AUSTIN — The Travis County grand jury has indicted 31 women on felony theft charges stemming from alleged welfare fraud.

The welfare fraud cases accuse the 31 of thefts ranging from $209 to $370.

Additional indictments are sought in cases involving more than $50,000, local authorities said.

Officials presented evidence to the grand jury concerning 73 welfare fraud cases, and expect to file remaining 42 cases in a few weeks.

Dick Chenault, supervisor of the Department of Human Resources Central Texas investigative unit, said 90 percent of the fraud allegations presented to the grand jury involved persons who failed to report earnings from employment after approval of their applications for food stamps or aid to family dependent children.
