Taking part in drug program could keep judge on bench

United Press International
OAKLAND, Calif. — Marijuana-growing charges against state Court of Appeals Justice Paul Halvonik could be erased if he elects to participate in a "drug diversion" program — a course that might allow him to keep his $65,000-a-year post.

Halvonik and his attorney wife, Deborah, are eligible for the court-sponsored program, according to the vice officer who led last Wednesday's raid on the judge's posh hillside home.

If accepted into the program, the defendants must informally admit responsibility for the drug charges. However, they need never go on trial and the records of the arrest will be expunged.

The Halvoniks were arrested last Wednesday after a search of their home uncovered 323 potted marijuana plants, two "baggies" of processed marijuana and $100 worth of cocaine, police said.

Brown expects to win Texas primary vote

United Press International
LOS ANGELES — Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr., returning from a presidential campaign foray, said Tuesday night he believes he has "a good chance of winning" in Texas.

Brown said he felt his economic stance would help him in Texas.

Brown replied to news reports that Tom Quinn, his campaign manager, had told reporters in New Hampshire Tuesday that in the Democratic primary there, "first place is conceded to Kennedy" and the race will be "a battle for second place" between Brown and President Carter.
