Cheese is hot seller

If your taste buds have a craving for some south-of-the-border cuisine, you're in luck, if you also like cheese.

The Dairy Science Club is carrying on a fund-raising project it began in 1971 — making and selling jalapeno cheese.

In the creamery at Texas A&M, gallon jugs of chopped jalapenos sit near the 120 pounds of cheese that is melted down each week to be combined with the peppers.

With a donation of 400 pounds of natural process colby and cheddar cheese from the L. D. Schrieber Cheese Company of Missouri, the club produces about four batches of the jalapeno cheese every semester.

"We do have to buy about 200 pounds of cheese each semester from a company in Houston to fill all of our orders," said Greg Batts, member in charge of the cheese making.

The club gets the jalapenos from local grocers.

"We never quite know how many jalapenos to put in because some say the cheese is too hot and some say it's not hot enough," Batts said. He said the number depends on the temperament of the cheese making crew of the day.

The cheese must first be cut and melted in a gallon vat at the creamery. "We are using a half-and-half mix of colby and cheddar cheese this year," said Dr. Ron Richter, adviser for the group.

Phosphates must then be added as emulsifiers to keep the fat from separating in the cheese and citrate is added as a preservative.

Two gallons of jalapenos and a bit of salt are added give the spicy Mexican flavor as the cheese melts to a smooth consistency.

The viscous liquid is then poured into 2-pound bags and set in the boxes which act as molds for the cheese. One batch of cheese usually accounts for 60 2-pound boxes of the hot stuff.

Batts said that it took a while for sales to catch on, but that this year it's selling like hotcakes. "We hardly get one batch made before it is all sold. We made 120 pounds of it on Monday and it was all gone by Thursday."

The cheese, which takes about three and a half hours to make, is sold for $4 a 2-pound box.
