A&M starts course in beginning math

Even for some students at technically oriented Texas A&M University, math is a four-letter word. But mathematics professor Dr. Norman W. Naugle, has developed an alternative to "heavy" math and aimed his new course at the expanding population of students seeking degrees in less scientific fields. "Historically, Texas A&M has assumed that all students entering the school have had at least two years of high school algebra and one year of geometry," he said, adding that some do not. His course is designed for those who don't have an affinity for figures. "Students have to have tenacity to make it through, but they definitely can do it, especially in this course," he said. Each student works at his own pace. He may repeat sections which he has not yet mastered and race through areas in which he has no trouble. Rather than seven exams, students take tests on a chapter and must make a grade or better to proceed. The course covers all the material taken more than once, despite when the student finishes. "The course is also there for very bright student who is motivated and can work on his or her own," Naugle said. About 150 students are enrolled in the program, many of whom are there because they work at a slower pace. Mathematics is required of student at Texas A&M, Naugle said, and many students have lack sufficient knowledge for grades with students having extensive math backgrounds. He said the fear of math to develop during the junior and high school years. Younger students usually through the sixth grade do math problems with just help. Somewhere in between thing happens and people lose interest in math, Naugle said.
