Invalid freezes inside house

NEWPORT, Tenn. — When Beatrice Hale collapsed and died of a heart attack, her bedridden brother was unable to heat the wood stove that was their home's only source of heat.

For two freezing days, Kenneth Hale was kept alive by his mongrel dog Bimbo who huddled on his master's chest and provided enough warmth for Hale to survive until officers arrived.

Their help was not enough. Hale, 63, died Monday at a hospital of cancer and exposure.

Police had found him in his rural home Sunday, lying helpless on the floor with his dead sister nearby.

Cocke County Sheriff Bobby Stinson called the scene "about as bad as you want to see."

Authorities were called to the old house on Cave Church Road Sunday when neighbors saw no smoke and no activity in the home. Officials smashed down the locked door to get in.

The officers found Hale, clad only in a shirt, lying on the floor. Bimbo was sitting on his chest barking. The house had no electricity.

"All they had was the woodburning stove. It was not that they couldn't afford electricity, they just didn't want it," said Non Henry, a neighbor who gave the family the dog, described as small with some "beagle in him."

Tom Poe, director of the Ambulance Service, said the dog's body heat apparently kept Hale alive until help arrived Sunday. Bimbo was taken to a neighbor's home for care.

"That dog dearly loved Mr. Kenneth. I suspect he sensed something was wrong," she said. "We knew something was wrong. My husband went over there and the door was locked from the inside. He also heard Bimbo in there barking."

Stinson said the woman apparently suffered the heart attack Friday, since a bag of groceries she bought then was sitting on a table.

Temperatures dipped into the teens in the area during the weekend and Stinson speculated the home had been without heat since Friday when the fire died out.

Stinson said it was colder "inside the house" than outside. The sheriff said the brother had apparently worked his way out of bed and tried to crawl to the sister.

"He was conscious when we found him, but barely," Stinson said.

The neighbor said Miss Hale had been told last week by doctors in Knoxville she had heart trouble. She said Hale knew he didn't have long to live because of his cancer.

Hale was taken to the Cocke County Hospital Sunday. He died about 11:50 a.m. Monday.

Couple finds farm life keeps expenses low

United Press International
VIRGINIA BEACH, Va. — Atop a weathered barn a giant windmill whirrs, generating electricity for the home of retired mechanic Lewis Love and his wife, Helen.

Below, Love is busy in his workshop, designing a new contraption — a homemade distillery to produce industrial alcohol for his two tractors, a combine and home heat.

Inside the white farmhouse, Mrs. Love cans garden vegetables and talks about their chosen way of life — aimed at self-sufficiency.

"We want to be able to get on our own as much as possible," said Mrs. Love, a native of New York City. "Some of my white friends from New York can't do it."

They have erected a windmill completed last fall although currently undergoing revisions, dug a well to augment one already on the farm and received the first permit to build a still for industrial alcohol.

"We get along fine," Mrs. Love, 66, a short but powerful built dynamo who hopes to complete the still, designed to produce 120 gallons of fuel a month, spring.

Love plans to use the industrial alcohol for farm machinery as well as to heat his home, replacing the gas he uses for his furnace.
