Pioneer tells of Saturn

United Press International
MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. — When Pioneer 11 approached Saturn and its spectacular rings last September, scientists could put all they knew for sure about the planet on a single piece of paper. Now knowledge of Saturn has been increased a thousand-fold, and Earth-bound computers are still laboring to digest the massive amount of data Pioneer gathered.

Scientists study loss of Voyager 1 contact

United Press International
PASADENA — Jet Propulsion Laboratory scientists Sunday re-established direct radio contact with the Voyager 1 spaceprobe, now 660 million miles from Earth en route to Saturn, JPL officials said.

It was earlier assumed the spacecraft failed to turn its big antenna toward Earth completely after making a slight course change, the spokesman said, but now engineers and scientists can read the data in the spacecraft's computers to see what went wrong.

Contact with the instrument-packed spacecraft was lost Thursday during a trimming maneuver. Radio controllers were not sure what caused the difficulty.

Voyager 1 is en route to a flyby of the ringed planet Saturn in November. Last March it took the first close-up, high resolution pictures of Jupiter and its moon system.
