Adamson death may be murder

NAIROBI, Kenya — The family of Joy Adamson Tuesday went ahead with the cremation of her body at a private ceremony. But questions on the circumstances of the famed naturalist's death persisted.

Police were questioning three men suspected of using a twin-edged African sword to stab Mrs. Adamson, who gained worldwide fame with her "Born Free" series about Elsa the orphan lion cub.

Her body was found on her game preserve last Thursday and initial reports said she had been mauled by a lion.

"We're having a private ceremony for the family at the crematorium, but there will be no public ceremony at all," said Ellis T. Monke, a local wildlife official and close family friend.

Police sources said Monday the three suspects all were former employees of Mrs. Adamson whom she had dismissed in the past few months.

They said a police autopsy had shown on Friday Mrs. Adamson had died of wounds from a sharp instrument, probably a twin-bladed "simi," an African knife that closely resembles a small sword.

Police Commissioner Ben Gethi told the Kenya News Agency the case was being treated as a "murder," although he did not disclose a possible motive.

Newspaper reports said Mrs. Adamson's car had been stolen from the scene of the crime, at her Shaba game camp, some 250 miles north of Nairobi.

The original police report, which said Mrs. Adamson had been mauled by a marauding lion, was based on a quick observation by Mrs. Adamson's assistant, and not a medical exam, officials said.

During the weekend, President Daniel Arap Moi announced a police investigation into her death after new facts had come to light.

The facts were believed to be the results of a pathologist's autopsy which showed puncture wounds on her body rather than the marks normally caused by a lion's claws.

Mrs. Adamson had been studying the habits of leopards at the time of her death. She was found lying on the ground about 100 yards from her barbed-wire enclosed compound after failing to return from an evening stroll.

Part of what you earn is pride.

Pride may be the biggest reward for serving in the Army Reserve.
In addition to the feeling you'll get for serving your Country part-time, you'll have other rewards.
Good pay, for one thing, you'll be well paid for the 16 hours a month and two weeks Annual Training you put in. There's job-training which could help you in your career.
There's low-cost insurance. Plus retirement benefits, including medical and dental care.
But, above all, it's pride young men and women are earning in the Army Reserve today.
To share the feeling, check into openings and see if you qualify — today.
