Food-handling class now required for health card

By NANCY ANDERSON
City Staff

Bryan food handlers seeking health cards will now have to take a class on proper food handling, instead of the tuberculosis and tests previously required.

Brazos County health unit and class instructor Ruth Maddox said the purpose of the three-hour course is to prevent disease by educating workers to handle food correctly.

The course includes lectures, films about personal hygiene, food cooking and storing temperatures to prevent bacterial growth, proper cleaning of equipment, and insecticide use.

The cost of the class is $5. A health card will be issued upon completion. There will be no test on the material presented, Maddox said, and the card will be good for four years.

State funds to buy TB serum were recently stopped, she said, but state health officials decided that tests were not a good way to determine if a person was healthy.

"A person could pass the test and get TB the next," Maddox explained.

The fund cut-off prompted change, Maddox said.

Maddox did not know if the improve the quality of food handling.

"We'll just have to go with the course and see how it goes," she said.

Maddox said current health holders do not have to take the course until their cards expire.

The classes began Jan. 8 and held the first three Tuesdays of the month at the Brazos Center. Class time alternates each Tuesday one week it is held in the morning and the afternoon and one evening.
