Counselors dispel myths about service

By CAROL HANCOCK
Campus Staff

Room 017 in the YMCA building is a place only a few Texas A&M University students are aware of. It is the home of the Personal Counseling Service, and there seems to be confusion about what it has to offer.

Fred Dorn, a counseling intern, said students have their own conception of what the Personal Counseling Service does. Their ideas, he said, are usually part of common myths about the center.

Myth One: The service is only for people with real emotional problems.

Kerry Hope, a counseling psychologist, said the majority of students who come to personal counseling are average college students with average problems. Very few have chronic, serious problems.

The service is a crisis intervention and referral service, Hope said. This means it is not set up to handle long-term extreme cases. It will handle the more serious cases on a short-term basis, then refer them to a more appropriate area, she said.

Personal counseling helps students feel like they have their feet on the ground, Dorn said.

Myth Two: Personal Counseling does not have programs that pertain to the average student.

A personal counseling group program was initiated last semester, and it offers a variety of subjects. Some groups are specialty groups while others include anyone.

An assertiveness training group teaches students to be assertive but not necessarily aggressive.

Relaxation training helps the student fight anxiety and stress. There is also a procrastination group for students having trouble with budgeting their time.

There are specialty groups for vet students, female cadets, graduate students, women in careers and pre-professionals. The pre-marital enrichment group is for both married and unmarried students.

A once-a-week career workshop is open to anyone and can help a student in deciding a career, making decisions and finding resources that career.

The groups meet at various times and days during the week and easily fit into a student's schedule, Dorn said.

Myth Three: The student will be placed wherever the counselor thinks best.

A student can choose any group that interests him as well as individual counseling, Hope said. The personal growth groups have 15 students in them at a time, she said. The students can choose who they will feel most comfortable with.

Myth Four: Once a student goes to the personal counseling service he or she is assigned a group and obligated to go to each session.

There is no pressure on a student to attend every session, Hope said. "Putting pressure on a student would defeat our purpose," she said. "If a student feels he or she no longer needs to go to a session, have done my job."

Myth Five: The counselors try to tell a student what to do. "We do not tell people what to do. We teach people how to take care of themselves emotionally," Hope said. The counselors help students look at their options and decide for themselves, she said. "We're neither advice-givers nor shrinkers; we're counselors."

Myth Six: The counselors are qualified to help a student.

Each of the 10 counselors has at least a master's in counseling. They are both male and female counselors.

There are a lot of things people put up with and don't have to, Dorn said.

"Learning about yourself allows you to deal with situations you encounter. The Personal Counseling Service teaches you about yourself."

Murray leads locals in race

By ANDY WILLIAMS
General Assignments Reporter

Graduate student Tinker Murray led a handful of local runners through a warm, humid, and windy Houston Marathon Saturday.

Murray finished 21st out of about 2,000 starters. His time for the 26.2-mile race was 2:31:59, the second best of his career, though he said he didn't expect to run that well.

The winner was Ron Tabb of Houston, who finished in a meet record 2:13:35. The winner of the women's division was Vanessa Vajdos, who ran a 2:44:46.

Murray, a physical education student, ran much of the race with Jimmy Sterling, an A&M Consolidated High School student who finished in 2:34, and Don Kirby, a range science graduate student, whose time was 2:39.

Dr. Carl Gabbard, an assistant professor in the health and physical education department, was one of several runners who complained about the weather.
