Slow state growth, prof urges Texans

United Press International DENTON — Texas, a Texan claims, is the land of wide open spaces, natural resources, sunny skies and a disastrous population growth rate.

And his worry focuses on domestic immigrants — other Americans who choose to move to the Lone Star State.

Growth rate figures indicate Texas is on its way to cultivating a northeastern-style megalopolis. Thus it is using up its natural resources and polluting its waterways and air, said philosopher and humanist Dr. Pete Gunter, who has also researched growth in Florida and Hawaii.

"Here's one way to look at it: they screwed up their part of the country and now they want to do it to ours," said Gunter, who wants to educate Texans about the thousands of immigrants entering the state each month and jeopardizing "our life support system."

"In 2020, 30 million people will be living in Texas in a city that stretches from San Antonio to Sherman-Denison, and Texas will be out of oil, natural gas and probably water if Texas continues to pursue growth," Gunter said.

He said the state will run out of exportable oil by the 1990s and cheap natural gas a little later; the high plains is running out of irrigation water; and the coastal zone is having pollution problems related to the establishment of an industrial zone.

"I'm a Texan and I'd hate to live in a gigantic southwestern slum," said Gunter, a philosophy professor at North Texas State University.

Best known for his part in the battle to enlarge the Big Thicket natural preserve in southeast Texas, he has served on one of Lt. Gov. Bill Hobby's water development committees and on the Coastal Zone Management Program board.

As a result, he said, he has seen firsthand the huge growth in Texas — about 26,000 people per month.

"I am convinced it will end up super-crowded and without the native resources to support all this. Texas is going to lose one-fifth of its agricultural land in the next 20 years if the growth rate keeps up."

The solution, Gunter said, is to slow the rate of growth, plan for it, and save farmland.

"We need to be tough on people who want to move a business here so we won't get polluters. There needs to be education to let people know the problems."

Gunter conceded it would be unconstitutional to keep people out of Texas through legislation.

But he suggested chambers of commerce throughout the state stop "pumping for growth," the state should stop advertising itself nationwide as the land of paradise and corporations moving to Texas be required to face stringent environmental regulations and fewer tax breaks.

"We need a more controlled rate of growth without so much damn pumping to have the whole world down here to live. How stringent are we going to be about letting people build in the coastal zone? We can't tough on them in terms of their alliance, where they build, how much energy they use up."

"We're in a seller's market. We've got something here that everybody wants. It's stupid of us to sell it cheaply."

Gunter said Houston will probably be the first city in the state to start realizing it will have to slow immigration because of its already huge growth.

"If they did this now we could save ourselves a lot of grief. The more people you have living together the more pioneer individualism goes out the window."

Pilot avoids landing goof

United Press International BROWNSVILLE — A pilot, almost mistakenly landed a Brownsville-bound Texas International jet in Harlingen and an air safety official blames a dangerous lack of radar equipment for the mix-up.

TI Flight 970, en route from Houston to Brownsville Monday afternoon, had been cleared for a visual landing in Brownsville. The pilot later informed the control tower that he had sighted the field and was making his final approach. He soon realized he was at the airport in Harlingen about 25 miles away and quickly gained altitude and headed for Brownsville without incident.

John Galipault, head of the Ohio-based Aviation Safety Institute, said the area does not have sufficient radar coverage which could have prevented the situation.

"If we don't get some radar coverage there soon we're going to have a horrible mid-air collision," he said.

The plane had a crew of four and 64 passengers.
