Public radio hit by growing pains

United Press International
WASHINGTON—National Public Radio, the 10-year-old alternative to commercial radio, has been having some growing pains. Its most recent problem has been NPR's new Morning Edition, an audio news magazine that was designed as a counterpart of NPR's award-winning evening program, All Things Considered.

NPR searched a year longer than planned for people to produce Morning Edition. Once producers were found, they quickly hired two morning hosts, whose role is essential in setting the tone of the show. After the first few dry runs, NPR decided the show was going to flop and, 10 days before the show's targeted November debut, fired the executive producer, the producer and two show hosts.

"It just wasn't headed anywhere, there was no format," said Richard Lewis, assistant director of news and information. He said the problem, however, was more than the sometimes illogical order of the pieces. "There was too much happy talk, a forced conviviality that showed no respect for the listeners," Lewis said, summing up the general feeling at NPR.

So that Morning Edition could start as scheduled, NPR rounded up two surefire anchors: Bob Edwards, co-host of All Things Considered since 1974; and Barbara Hocter, a former NBC reporter and writer, who had recently been an ATC weekend host. Lewis says reaction to the first three programs has been "very positive."

But in Springfield, Ill., Mike Strand is miffed. A reporter for WSSR, one of NPR's 228 member stations, Strand said NPR, particularly All Things Considered, is not living up to its early policy to draw approximately half of its programming from member stations throughout the United States and Puerto Rico.

"The choices of material continues to lean more toward Washington. They're not relying on the member stations," Strand said.

Though Morning Edition uses about three to four member station reports each hour, Strand said ATC relies heavily on staff reports or phone interviews from NPR bases in Washington, New York and Chicago.

'80s technology may change role of American teachers

United Press International
COLUMBUS—The father of the team-teaching concept predicts technology will have a bigger impact in American schools in the 1980s, giving teachers more time to concentrate on nutritional and social problems.

Robert H. Anderson, professor and dean at Texas Tech University, says the use of calculators and other electronic devices will free teachers "to come to grips with other issues" rather than spending most of their time teaching basic skills.

As for education in the 1980s Anderson sees:

—A major change in emphasis: what children are taught. He says schools will concentrate more on teaching pupils how to be healthy, how to enjoy leisure time and how to hold a job and stay vocationally competitive.

"My dream is to see teachers get much training as doctors," he said, an address to Columbus school administrators this weekend. "The (teachers') training would be longer and of more depth."
