Prison war of race and revenge launched by contraband liquor

United Press International
SANTA FE, N.M. — What seems certain to become the bloodiest prison riot in American history began with a handful of prisoners drinking contraband liquor in the recreation room of Dormitory E.
Two guards, making their 1:30 a.m. check, tried to break up the party early Saturday. They never had a chance.

They were quickly taken hostage and the rebel prisoners were on their way to the administrative building where they threw the master switches, unlocking entire cellblocks in the overcrowded prison that held 1,136 inmates.

Within 30 minutes, about 250 of those inmates had seized control of the New Mexico State Penitentiary, taken 14 guards hostage and begun their 36-hour war of racial violence and revenge against "snitches."

Inmates were hacked apart with homemade knives, tortured with blow torches, castrated and raped.

"When this thing started people just turned into animals," said one inmate who told of being bound and raped by 10 prisoners. "I'm lucky to be here."

By early Tuesday the bodies of 35 men — all inmates and most of them Mexican-American — had been recovered and another 15 inmates were missing. Officials said they expected to find more bodies in the still smoldering buildings, and this riot could surpass the bloody record of 43 killed in the Attica, N.Y., riot in 1971.

Buildings were set ablaze, with many of the prisoners dying of smoke inhalation. Damage to the facility was estimated as high as $40 million.

Once they had taken over the prison, the inmates' team of negotiators demanded an end to overcrowding, better food and more visiting privileges.

But the rebels were more concerned with revenge than reform.

They rifled administrative files to find where the informants — the despised "snitches" — were housed.

A "death squad" armed with homemade knives, clubs and a blowtorch went from cell to cell, maiming, killing and raping, surviving inmates said.

Authorities said they could not confirm there was a "death squad."

They said while some of the atrocities were for revenge, others were racially motivated.

The rebels' fury was fed by drugs from the prison infirmary, where they gobbled down incredible mixtures of tranquilizers, sleeping pills and insulin — anything they thought would get them high. Some inmates also sniffed solvents and glue from the prison's industrial facilities.

Seven of the deaths were attributed to self-administered drug overdoses, and prison officials say the violence was heightened by drug-crazed inmates.

Prison officials reported some of the dead had their eyes gouged out, their sexual organs removed and their arms and legs severed.

On Monday, as the surviving prisoners huddled in the 20 degree cold, separated in groups of 50-60, a small flock of buzzards hovered in the skies above the smoky stench emanating from the prison.

Denver gold probably safe atop Capitol

United Press International
DENVER — Thousands of dollars worth of gold lies atop the Colorado State Capitol, but officials aren't worried about thieves.

They say even with the soaring cost of gold it would take a thief with acrobatic skills of a monkey and brains of a gnat to try to chip a fortune off the statehouse roof.

"There's only one way to get to the roof and it's constantly guarded," said Hugh Fowler, a Republican state senator.

Fowler said it would be an impossible task for someone to try to retrieve the gold. He said natural elements have taken their toll and much of the gold "is probably all over the Capitol Hill neighborhood."

The impressive dome, which sits 272 feet above the ground, was first covered with 24 carat gold in 1908 when the Colorado Mining Association donated 200 ounces of the material to adorn the structure.

In 1950, another 50 ounces were donated for repair and refurbishing. Legislators have appropriated funds for a similar job later this year. It is no cheap task these days with the price of gold now about $700 an ounce.

Fowler said if anybody was willing to work for about 10 cents an hour, they might scour some gold out of the gutter, but it could hardly be worth anyone's time.

Lee White, director of the Colorado Department of Administration which is charged with overseeing the capitol and other state buildings said when the new gold is applied later this year, the most expensive cost to the state will not be the metal but the labor to put up the scaffolding and the actual application of the gold. The gold to be applied will be .004 inches thick. Only 40 ounces will be used.

"Probably very little gold is even up there now," White said. "We have had guys on bosun's chairs inspect it, and it is very heavily pitted. It's almost all gone in very many places."
