Crowds flock to JFK library

United Press International
BOSTON — Presidential libraries have been called "the pyramids of our times."

Since the newest pyramid — the John F. Kennedy Library — opened its doors last month, it has become one of the most popular attractions in the city.

Tourists and day trippers have come by the thousands to visit the modernistic concrete and glass library overlooking Boston Harbor. On some weekend afternoons, hundreds of people line up outside — sometimes waiting an hour to get in.

The library was dedicated Oct. 20 in ceremonies attended by President Carter and 6,000 other spectators — many of whom worked in or supported the Kennedy administration. The library was to have been built in Cambridge, Mass. near Harvard University. But Cambridge residents fought the idea, saying it would be too much of a traffic burden on a heavily congested area.

Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, the late president's widow, finally decided on the alternate site at the Boston Harbor Campus of the University of Massachusetts.

Architect I.M. Pei designed the $20 million library with an eye towards attracting visitors. He succeeded.

"Through January 19th we have had 177,597 visitors," said Frank Rigg, chief of visitor services at the library.

He said the library averages 13,500 visitors per week with most of them coming on weekends. Every president since Herbert Hoover has elected to have his personal papers stored in a library built in his honor, a practice which prompted Columbia University historian Henry Graff to call them "the pyramids of our times." The papers of earlier presidents are in the Library of Congress.

Planning for the Kennedy library was actually started by JFK himself. He envisioned having his post-presidential office in the library building, where he could concentrate on writing his memoirs.
