Scientists hint mumps and diabetes related

United Press International
ATLANTA — Federal health officials say that though there's no proven connection between mumps and diabetes, "limited experimental" research shows mumps infection may result in damage to the pancreas.

The Center for Disease Control said Sunday further research is needed to determine whether mumps, which causes painful swelling of the pancreas and other glands, contributes to the development of diabetes.

Diabetes occurs when the pancreas fails to produce enough insulin to prevent an oversupply of sugar in the blood.

"There are limited experimental, clinical and epidemiologic data that pancreatic damage may result from injury caused by direct viral (mumps) invasion," the center said in its latest Morbidity and Mortality Weekly report.

Researchers are wondering if the damage mumps might cause to the pancreas could promote diabetes, but the center says evidence from the tests do not yet draw a direct link.

"It's not been determined whether there is a cause-and-effect relationship," said Dr. John Kobayashi of the CDC's immunization division.

However, Kobayashi said even though it might not contribute to diabetes, "there are other reasons for immunizing children against mumps."

He cited what he termed "a very safe vaccine against mumps" which has been widely used since 1967 and, he said, gives long-lasting protection against mumps.

The CDC has reported a continued decline in mumps cases since the vaccine was introduced. Last year about 14,000 cases were reported. There were 16,681 in 1978 and 21,436 in 1977, the center said, as opposed to 128,295 cases in 1966 — the year before the vaccine was available.

Earthquake in California

United Press International
EUREKA, Calif. — An earthquake at 6:15 a.m. Monday shook the floor of the Pacific Ocean off Northern California and was felt at some points along the coast.

The University of California seismographic station at Berkeley reported the quake was centered 60 miles southwest of Eureka.

It had a Richter magnitude of 5.2.

Pay-not-to-grow furor to pep up ag hearings

United Press International
WASHINGTON — Senate Agriculture Committee and House Agriculture subcommittee hearings will be livelier this week than they were last week.

Sessions held by both panels dined on all last week as farm groups made pleas for more aid to soften the impact of the Russian grain embargo on farmers.

Legislators from farm states said they were outraged about low farm prices.

Audiences in the hearing rooms were small and many members of the respective panels didn't show up. Howard Hjort, the Agriculture Department's chief economist, postponed an appearance before the Senate Agriculture Committee, an unusual action for him.

Despite concern about farm prices and inflation in farm costs, everyone was waiting for one thing: the administration's announcement of whether farmers would be paid not to plant some of their spring feed grains crops.

When Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland announced on Friday that the administration had decided against a feed grains paid diversion, legislators promised quick action on further legislation to offset the impact of the grain embargo.

Reacting to the administration's announcement, Sen. Herman Talmadge, D-Ga., said he was "deeply disappointed that the Carter administration has declined to establish a paid diversion program for 1980 feed grains."

"It now becomes more important than ever that Congress promptly consider all legislative options to help President Carter keep his pledge to minimize the impact of the Russian grain embargo on the nation's farmers," he said.

A member of the House Agriculture Committee, Rep. Berkley Bedell, D-Iowa, said his constituents were "almost unanimous in their feeling that we urgently need a paid diversion program."

Marvin Meek, national chairman of the American Agriculture Movement, said his group supported production controls.
