Soviets deny academician status for dissident leader Sakharov

MOSCOW — Exiled dissident leader Andrei Sakharov said Tuesday, in a statement issued through the fiancée of his stepson, he had in effect been deprived of his academician status by the Soviet Academy of Sciences.

Sakharov earlier in the day tried to call a news conference but was prevented from talking to reporters by militiamen.

In a message from Gorky where he was exiled last month, Sakharov said he received a telegram from the prestigious Soviet Academy of Sciences relieving him of his responsibility to attend the annual academy conference which opened Tuesday.

"The participation in the general session of the Academy of Sciences is the right and duty of each member according to its statutes," Sakharov said. "To my request to participate, the presidium (of the academy) replied by in effect taking upon itself the responsibility to deprive me of that right and to relieve me of my function as an academician."

Lisa Alexeyeva, the fiancée of Sakharov's stepson, telephoned several Western reporters Tuesday morning and invited them to a news conference to be held in Sakharov's apartment.

When the reporters arrived, they were confronted by two Soviet policemen who told them that Lisa Alexeyeva was not in the apartment and that they could not go in.

The policemen said only Ruth Bonner, Sakharov's mother-in-law, and Maria Podyapolsky, an elderly friend of the Sakharov family, were in the 7th-floor apartment.

"We are here to protect Ruth Bonner," was the only explanation the policemen would offer for their presence to arriving reporters, who included camera crews from the NBC and ABC networks.

Sakharov's friends and relatives have said they fear the Academy may be asked to vote for the expulsion of the distinguished nuclear physicist.

The official news agency, Tass, reported the opening in a brief dispatch and that "the meeting up the results of the work by the Academy over the

U.S., Mexico sharing health care program

EL PASO — High level Mexican and U.S. officials are directing a cooperative program for emergency health care along the 1,950-mile border to benefit citizens of both countries.

Cooperation in emergency medical care is one of 10 public health categories which the U.S. Surgeon General, his Mexican counterpart and the director of the Pan American Health Organization agreed to address when they signed a Comprehensive Health Agreement in April, 1979.

The nine other categories are immunization, tuberculosis, maternal and child care, environmental health, health system planning and evaluation, use of comparable statistics, economic analysis, disease surveillance and exchange of Spanish language health education materials. These will be discussed at the Border Health Association's annual meeting April 20-23 in Saltillo, Mexico.

A model for the emergency care portion of international cooperative health effort is a program that has been operating in the San Diego, Calif.-Tijuana, Mexico, area since 1976.

For instance, if an American citizen is seriously injured in Tijuana, he is first taken to Tijuana General Hospital and given emergency treatment, health officials said. The Mexican doctor telephones a physician at Bay General Hospital in Chula Vista, Calif., explains the treatment provided and makes arrangements for an American ambulance to transfer the patient to Bay General.

The cooperative agreement allows U.S. and Mexican officials at the border crossing to "just wave them right on" when the ambulance arrives, said Sarah A. Markarian, director of the San Diego County Emergency Medical Services.

On the other hand, if a poor Mexican citizen is injured in the San Diego area, he is taken to the hospital of the University of California at San Diego and the county pays the bill, she said.
