KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The 1930s was a raucous era for all-night clubs and dance halls. Marathon jam sessions poured wondrous new syncopated sounds into the street to mingle with the smoky sweet scent of barbecue.
It was the era of Kansas City jazz. And the city whose name became synonymous with its particular style was busily producing the likes of the immortal Charlie Parker, Count Basie and a dozen other great and near-great jazz artists.
Jazz found an inviting home in political boss Tom Pendergast's wide-open Kansas City. The action primarily was found in and around 12th and Vine.
"We would go to work at 7:30 every night and we would play until 5 in the morning. Then we would go to the Sunset (club) until 8," said Booker Washington, a 70-year-old trumpeter who played with Kansas City's legendary Bennie Moten band.

"On 12th Street and Broadway and going on to Brooklyn there probably were 200 places within four or five miles," said Milton Morris, 68, who has managed Kansas City jazz taverns and clubs for 50 years. He claims to have paid Basie $5 a night to play in one of them.
"They came from all over for the big sound. It came out every door. You would start juicing and have one drink in one club and one in the next.
"People were trying to forget the depression. There was no depression here. We swung more than Vegas does now."
But the street is decaying now.
The row upon row of clubs have long since closed. The area has become an inner city park and public housing project. There's even talk about putting up a shopping center at 12th and Vine.
The jazz returns — from time to time.

Each spring some of the country's foremost female musicians meet for the Women's Jazz Festival. Basie brought it back briefly last August in a free outdoor performance commemorating his 75th birthday.
Morris tries to sustain it daily by playing his 5,000 Kansas City jazz albums at Milton's Tap Room.
There are those who claim that true Kansas City jazz is alive and resides quickly in sanctuary at the Mutual Musicians Foundation where some musicians from the '30s jazz era gather after hours on weekend nights.
But the long nights of jazz and drink that produced many of today's top talents are gone.
Some observers say the reason jazz has not thrived in the city can be traced to the disco boom. A local newspaper critic has blamed the public who he says fail to patronize the music style.
Some even blame the Republican Party.
When Boss Pendergast's Democratic machine was broken in 1938, it also marked the end of the days of the wide open city. Now clubs must close at 1:30 a.m., a half hour earlier on Sundays.
"There was so much happening in Kansas City because Pendergast had opened the city up," said Dick Wright, music history lecturer at the University of Kansas. "Kansas City gave musicians a tremendous opportunity to perform because it became a hotbed of jazz."
It was also located in the heart of America and helped the development of bands such as Bennie Moten's, Andy Kirk's and Basie's. Musicians such as pianist McShann, saxophonist Young Jeter Turner and Pete Jolly practiced their trades here.

It was the days of the Bennie Moten, the Chesterfield, the Sunset, the Hey Hay, Drury Novelty clubs.
"Those clubs had everything, beer, booze, grass," said Morris.
Marijuana cigarettes were three for a quarter, the same price a beer with a chaser.
"The reason I got into jazz is I had the Ollie Harris barbecue at 12th and Vine," he said. "We would down there to get barbecue, but they didn't have air conditioning and the doors would be open. You would hear that jazz sound in the area — it was all the clubs."
When Moten's band began playing its tune in 1931, Bennie Washington left with other musicians who wanted to retain the old style. They formed the Kansas Rockets, later the Thymphony Orchestra.
On just about any afternoon, musicians linger at the fountain where a young jazz group, the City Orchestra, rehearses.
Over the pounding beat and raptures of the orchestra's music these men can spot Kansas City history as if it had been part of past weekend.
"Everybody was working," Orville "Piggy" Minor, who played in Basie's band. "This was Mecca. Some of the top soloists the world got their start here.

Post will file two libel suits
United Press International
INDIANAPOLIS — The publisher of the Saturday Evening Post says the magazine will sue the Columbia Journalism Review and the Rand Daily Mail of South Africa $10 million each for libel.
Post editor and publisher Curtis SerVaas said Monday legal proceedings were already under way and will be filed soon.
She said the publications in New York City and Johannesburg, South Africa, libeled both the Post and her husband, Beurt SerVaas, chairman of the Curtis Publishing Co., which publishes the Post and other magazines.
"An article which appeared in the Columbia Journalism Review said that Beurt SerVaas was reported by the South African press as being director of Afrifix, which was shown to be a front company for government to disseminate favorable propaganda about South Africa," Mrs. SerVaas said.
"Beurt SerVaas has never been director of Afrifix, the Citizen (funded by the South African Department of Information) or the company publishing the Citizen in South Africa," Mrs. SerVaas said.
