Reputed mob boss buried

United Press International
PHILADELPHIA — More than 3,000 people, including hundreds of curiosity-seekers, streamed past the casket of Angelo Bruno to view the slain body of the alleged Philadelphia mob kingpin.

Bruno, 69, was buried Wednesday following a private funeral and Catholic Mass of Christian Burial in a church in South Philadelphia near where he was gunned down in a car, gangland-style, last Friday night.

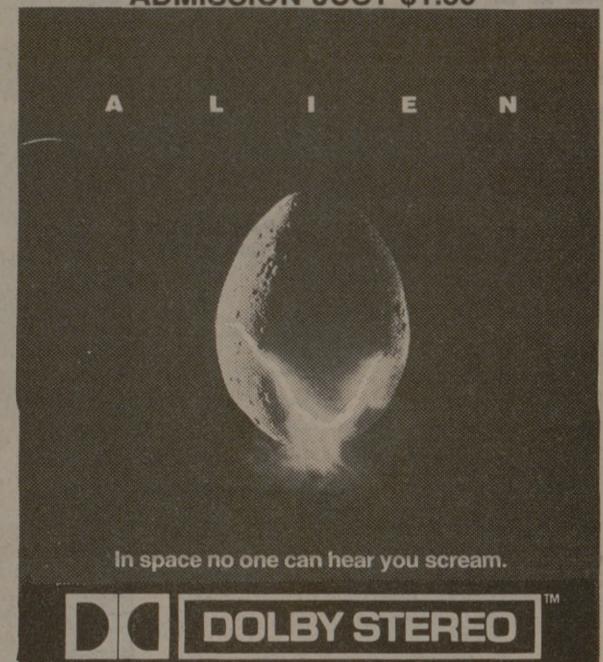

Flowers lined the huge parlor — crowded with about 500 people — where Bruno's body lay in a closed bronze casket. The name of Phillip "Chicken Man" Testa, a reputed Bruno lieutenant, was one of the names on the bouquets.

Among the mourners was Joseph Stanfa, 39, driver of the car in which Bruno was killed in front of his home. Also attending were Frank Narducci, a reputed member of Bruno's organization, and Frank Sheeran, a Delaware Teamsters local boss.

Mourners, including teen-agers wearing blue jeans and sneakers and women attired in full-length mink coats, lined up and waited for up to 20 minutes in a slow procession to the casket.

A veteran police undercover agent has confirmed information from a UPI underworld source that a New York City mob hit-team, under investigation for 18 gangland murders, accepted the $250,000 murder contract on Bruno.
