

Budget, Israel vote cost Carter

WASHINGTON — The White House says President Carter lost to Sen. Edward Kennedy in New York and Connecticut because of his proposed budget cuts and Secretary of State Cyrus Vance's testimony opposing Jewish settlements on the West Bank.

Press secretary Jody Powell said a light voter turnout and heavy rain in New York also hurt Carter. He acknowledged the Carter camp had not expected the defeats, which followed polls showing the president with big leads.

"Certainly the president's decision on a balanced budget and also the United Nations vote on the Mideast peace process were politically costly," Powell said Tuesday night during a briefing at the White House.

"Quite frankly," Powell said, "there will be other decisions, both in the anti-inflation fight and in the attempt to keep the Camp David peace process alive that may be politically difficult. The president is prepared to make those decisions and accept the consequences."

Powell said the reopening of the Mideast discussion on Capitol Hill and the focus of coverage on American policy opposing Jewish settlements on the West Bank "produced a new movement among those most concerned."

Another key White House aide was more specific.

He said Vance's congressional testimony five days ago was interpreted in a hostile fashion by New York Jews. Vance said Carter disavowed the U.S. vote in the Security Council censuring Israeli settlements, not because it violated American policy but because of concern it would upset current negotiations on Palestinian self-rule.

"The same thing is true in perhaps a greater degree with regard to the budget and to the fight against inflation," Powell said. "There is almost nothing that is effective in battling inflation that is not politically costly in the short term. There will be innumerable interest groups who will find their programs and projects have been cut."

"The president wishes to congratulate Sen. Kennedy and all of his supporters for their victories in Connecticut and New York tonight," Powell said.

Most potential drafters to seek objector status

WASHINGTON — A Selective Service document made public Wednesday predicted "more than half" of the nation's draft registrants will seek conscientious objector status and recommended severe restrictions on such objectors.

The internal report, written last September as a "training assignment," does not represent official policy of the Selective Service or administration.

But Rep. Robert Kastenmeier, D-Wis., who made the document public, said it is the only paper available indicating how the draft office feels on dealing with the problem of resistance to draft registration.

Congress is working on the president's proposal to resume registration for the draft, but the issue is in trouble on Capitol Hill. "It is folly to assume total compliance with the president's proposal," Kastenmeier told a news conference.

He said even if only 2 percent of the 19- to 20-year-old male population refused to register under the Carter proposal "we are talking about close to 80,000 lawbreakers."

The internal Selective Service document — prepared by Air Force Reserve Maj. Don Guritz at the request of top Selective Service officials — recommended against registering women for the draft. And it warned:

"We can reasonably expect that in any future emergency draft, more than half of the registrants will seek conscientious objector status, particularly if females are made subject to involuntary military service."

It said Selective Service should consider two legislative proposals restricting access to conscientious objector status.

— Recission of the conscientious objector exemption, modeled on the World War I statute.

— Restriction of the conscientious objector exemption to practicing members of religions that specifically prohibit participation in military service.

The document also recommended legislative changes that eliminate a requirement that the Selective Service system give a reason for denying so-called "CO" status and that denial of objector status not be open to review by any other government agency or court.

The document also opposed registration and drafting of women and said that "since many female registrants could reasonably be expected to claim conscientious objector status, the alternate service program might be overwhelmed by them."

WOODSTOCK CONDOMINIUMS

The Woodstock condominiums and why they make sense today.

The condominium is a time-tested great idea. The Greeks and Romans used the basic concept over 3,000 years ago. Today, the Woodstock condominiums are a beautiful example of the modern alternate to apartment living.

Located on Highway 30, Woodstock gives you direct access to Texas A&M University, major shopping centers and all sorts of recreation. Heavily wooded, a wandering creek accents the landscaped area.

Inside, you'll find all the built-ins, a fireplace, patio, balconies and a large selection of professionally decorated interiors to choose from, with optional interiors that stretch the imagination.

Stop paying rent. The re-sale value of your condominium should increase dramatically in the next few years. Rent is an expense - a Woodstock condominium is an investment.

Prices start at $42,750. Up to 95% financing is available to qualified buyers.
