Pageant Saturday

By DEBBIE NELSON
Campus Staff
Eighty-four women will compete Saturday night in the Cotton Pageant, sponsored by the Texas A&M Agronomy Society.
Contestants, ranging in age from 16-26, were selected by campus organizations. A&M Mother's Clubs, A&M Clubs and civic and local organizations, according to Jamey Douglass, social secretary for the Agronomy Society.
About 50 percent of the women attend Texas A&M University, with others from Bryan-College Station and other universities.
Douglass said the purpose of the pageant is to promote cotton.
Nine finalists will be chosen on the basis of interviews with the judges Saturday morning and modeling the night of the pageant. The queen will receive a check for $100 and a bouquet of flowers, while the remaining eight women will be named cotton princesses, Douglass said.
Two seniors chosen from the Agronomy Society, King Cotton Zachary Yanta and Sweetheart Shannon Sower, will crown the new queen.
Although it originated in 1932, the Cotton Pageant has changed over the years. Douglass said as many as 181 women competed some years. Contestants were judged on the basis of cotton dresses they had made themselves.
Back then, money made from the pageant was used to send selected agronomy seniors on a world tour to learn about agriculture.
In 1956, Douglass said, the pageant was discontinued. Since then, proceeds from the pageant have been used to sponsor Agronomy Society trips to state and national meetings.
Using workmanship of the contestants' cotton dresses as the criteria for choosing the queen also has been discontinued. Douglass said, "the days of 50 percent darning, 100 percent polyester, candidates now judged on poise and appearance on stage."
The pageant begins at 7 p.m. in the Rudder Auditorium, with the queen for choosing the queen also has been discontinued. Douglass said, "the days of 50 percent darning, 100 percent polyester, candidates now judged on poise and appearance on stage."
