

'Attack' victims get aid

By BRIAN BLALOCK

A woman ran around screaming from the shock of what she saw. A sniper attack had turned the peaceful area around Rudder Fountain into a combat zone, leaving a dozen bloody bodies to litter the concrete.

An ambulance drives up, men and women run to care for the wounded. After assuring the victims everything would be all right, their wounds are bandaged and they are carefully carried back to a maroon and white ambulance where they get up laughing and take off their wrappings.

It was all part of a class demonstration held Friday around noon by Susan Greer and Cheri Trahan, both enrolled in the emergency medical techniques class at Texas A&M University.

Greer said the demonstration, which included members of the Texas A&M Emergency Care Team (TAMECT), was a class project designed to give members of the team practice in the handling of victims of an emergency.

She said she was pleased with the demonstration and thrilled with the way all those who participated were able to stabilize all the victims and have them ready for transportation in about 30 minutes.

Laura Kitzmiller, director of the Emergency Care Program in the Health and Physical Education Department here, said she was also pleased with the demonstration and said she hoped there would be more such practices in the future in order to call attention to the TAMECT and the classes available in emergency training.

"If we could get more people trained in first aid, our community would be a much safer place to live," Kitzmiller said.

She said this was the first time that the TAMECT had staged a demonstration on campus, but the team had staged demonstrations before at the fireman's training school and at LBJ State Park.

While a number of the crowd of onlookers gathered around Rudder Fountain thought the fake wounds were grotesque and real, Greer said the wounds were made with mortician's wax, some small chicken bones and some plastic fake wounds. She said the blood was made by mixing syrup and a red dye. She said the "victims" were all members of the TAMECT and first aid classes at Texas A&M.

Disease may reach U.S. by mosquitos

United Press International
ATLANTA — Cases of dengue fever have been confirmed in Mexico, touching off concern among federal health officials that the mosquito-borne ailment may eventually reach the United States.

The national Center for Disease Control said incidences of dengue fever were spotted in Tampico, a Gulf Coast city, 300 miles south of the Texas border, in mid-February. The disease was discovered during a field study conducted by the Mexican Ministry of Health and Welfare and the CDC.

Dengue fever, nicknamed "break-bone fever" because of the intense discomfort it causes among its victims, is spread by the Aedes aegypti mosquito, the same type of mosquito that spreads yellow fever.

"Because A. aegypti is widely distributed in Mexico, the Gulf Coast and the southeast Atlantic states of this country, dengue may spread further through Mexico and may reach the continental United States; the likelihood and timing of such spread are unknown," the CDC said in its Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report.

Dengue fever is characterized by a sudden onset of fever for about 5 days, intense headache, joint and muscle pains, and rash. Doctors say recovery is associated with prolonged fatigue and depression but that the disease seldom kills its victims.
