Unusual farm quota benefits landowners

United Press International
RALEIGH, N.C. — Tobacco planting season has barely started, but David and Pat Proctor already have made $9,600 on a crop they are not going to grow.

The couple has leased their quota — their federally granted right to sell 24,000 pounds of the leaf. With the 40 cents they got for each pound, the Proctors developed the grain crop they are growing on the land where the tobacco would have been.

Cynthia Harris is leasing her 12,869 pounds of tobacco. Unlike the Proctors, Harris is not a farmer. She said she has the quota because she inherited a farm from her father, who rarely tilled the soil, but still had the quota because his father was a farmer.

The Proctors and Harris are among the more than 170,000 property owners nationally who capitalize every year on one of America's most unusual property rights: the tobacco quota.

Created in the late 1930s, the quota for both flue-cured and burley tobacco has evolved into a means for some landholders to make money off the work of others.

Last year about 121,000 of the 193,500 farm owners with quota rights to flue-cured tobacco leased their quotas, the U.S. Department of Agriculture said. Among burley tobacco growers the proportion was smaller; about 52,000 landholders of the 305,000 leased.

Some agriculture officials claim those leases are offered predominantly by retired farmers who need the extra cash to hold onto their farms.

But Billy Yeargin, executive secretary of the Tobacco Growers' Information Committee, says many quota holders are lumber and paper companies, churches and other nonfarm groups.

"I would say a very large percentage of those quota owners are not involved in tobacco farming whatsoever," he said.

Runathon helps heart patients

United Press International
NEW YORK — It's Americans running to help other Americans.

The first National Run For Life Day, held last year, was regarded as a major success. People all across the United States came out and ran to raise $500,000 for the American Heart Association.

If the organizers have their way, the second annual event — which will take place Saturday — will bring in twice that amount. More than 30 cities are taking part that day, with at least 20 more set for scattered dates afterward.

Run For Life is billed as the world's "largest non-competitive athletic event" — a "runathon."

Anyone can run for as long as he can for sponsor pledges to contribute to the Heart Association.

There were more than 28,000 runners in last year's event, sponsored by the AHA and the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. in cooperation with the Presidential Council on Physical Fitness and Sports.

"National Run For Life Day makes a significant contribution to Americans all across the country," said Olympic gold medal winner Eric Shorter, the event's national spokesman. "By stressing the competitive aspects of running, it enables everyone to take that first step toward achieving fitness."

"Through raising money for much-needed heart research, National Run For Life Day will help the American Heart Association's fight to stamp out America's No. 1 killer."

Each local event will be organized as a 10-mile, or less, untimed run. To date, 25 governors have proclaimed Saturday National Run For Life Day in their states.

Participants in last year's event ranged from a dog with a pacemaker running in Minneapolis, to an 80-mile track team who traveled 100 miles from a remote eskimo village in Anchorage.

This year, Los Angeles Rams quarterback Vince Ferragamo, a professional student, and chairman of the Orange County, Calif., event, plans to run 100 miles. So do members of the U.S. Olympic Torch Relay Team, who carried the Olympic flame to Lake Placid.

An honorary celebrity committee for the day includes Edward Amos, Tony Bennett, Angie Dickinson, DiMaggio, Willie Mays and McMahon.
