Railroad and bus highlight issues in commission race

United Press International
Railroad Commissioner Jim Nugent boarded a bus in Texarkana Tuesday to begin a campaign swing through East Texas and said his mode of transportation was symbolic of the difference between him and his Democratic primary challenger, Jim Hightower.

At the same time Nugent climbed aboard the bus, Hightower was boarding a train in Dallas to begin a whistle stop trip that culminated late Tuesday at San Antonio.

"I think it is indicative of the race that we are in that we are fixing to load up and ride on a free enterprise bus this morning, bound through East Texas to the coast, while my opponent is on the caboose of an Amtrak train traveling in North Texas, governed by the federal rules, governed by the federal regulations, set up to benefit the northeastern corridor of the United States, and indicative of the two different views of the campaign," Nugent said.

Hightower rode a Pullman car in back of an Amtrak train. At the first stop in Fort Worth he accused the three-member Railroad Commission of not protecting ordinary citizens.

"Texans are being railroaded on everything from utility bills to transportation service, and it's our railroad commissioners who are the chief engineers of the railroading," he said.

Hightower also said the Railroad Commission, as the watchdog for the public, had stood idly by while private railway management had dismantled Texas' statewide passenger system.

"Today, this same commission is meekly submitting to the steady deterioration and amputation of our Amtrak service, and now the commissioners are even rubber-stamping radical cuts in our freight depot services, especially in small cities and rural counties," he said.

Railroad Commission Chairman John Poerner, who is seeking reelection against Rep. Buddy Temple, D-Diboll, sent telegrams to Democratic county chairmen urging them to have as many registered voters as possible participate in Saturday's primary.
