COLLAGE

Environmental groups are formed to save the California condor, the great whale and the baby seal. But one lone student is working to save another well-known species from extinction.

University of Alabama graduate student Will Jordan is striving to save the slide rule, that once invaluable instrument now rendered virtually obsolete by the pocket calculator. Jordan's personal collection includes 60 slide rules, all given to him by friends or purchased at bargain basement prices from bookstore owners anxious to unload their remaining stocks.

Jordan doesn't expect his slide rules to become valuable and admits they're not particularly nice to look at. His main concern is that "nobody thinks about them or wants them anymore." — Collegiate Headlines

What combines the strategy of poker with the excitement of outdoor activity?

At the University of Iowa, it's strip volleyball, a new sport gaining popularity. The game is played the same way as regular volleyball, with one crucial exception: the player who misses the ball has to remove one item of clothing.

Because most games are played in public places, Iowa organizers say strip volleyball doesn't automatically become nude volleyball, as one might suspect. When a player reaches the point where removing more clothing would be indecent, a teammate must take something off. When all members of a team reach that critical point, that team is declared the loser.

Strip volleyball should catch on in places outside Iowa City, its organizers say. "It's a great game," says one, "especially if you're a good player." — Collegiate Headlines
