Survey: doubts, low morale

Soldiers down in the dump

United Press International HOUSTON — A University of

Houston sociologist's survey of American volunteer soldiers has disclosed low morale and doubts about the Army's capacity to field a strong fighting force

'They didn't feel very confident to wage war and were less confident of the people around them," Dr. David Gottlieb said of 115 volunteer enlistees he questioned at Fort Sill, Okla.

Gottlieb's survey was funded by the Army Research Institute. He emphasized it might not represent opinion throughout the Army, but said he built a survey model in-tended to reflect the Army's Gottlieb said he found low morale, boredom and a belief training was inadequate. He said the common feeling seemed to be, "We're at the bottom of the barrel. No one gives a damn about us.

The researcher said the volunteer Army can work, but the incentives, pay and benefits must be increased. He said that since the concept was launched eight years ago the benefits have not kept pace.

"If we need a highly competent, skilled, professional force, you've got to have a core of professionals," Gottlieb said. "If you want to have professionals, you're going to have to pay the price. Gottlieb said he found enlisted
