To the casual city dweller, the agricultural machinery and craft demonstrations that will be on display at the Brazos Center from Oct. 22 through Nov. 6 may seem somewhat less than the state of the art.

But to early agricultural pioneers and farm laborers they were more than just that; they were part of an inescapable day-to-day reality. Created as part of the Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Service, American Agriculture: A Continuing Revolution will be brought to the Brazos Valley under the co-sponsorship of the Brazos Valley Arts Council and the Agricultural Division of the Bryan-College Station Chamber of Commerce.

Written and researched by a former Smithsonian Institute curator, the exhibit traces the development of 200 years of American agriculture through text and period photographs.

Also featured at the exhibit will be early agricultural machinery, household implements, children's toys, and quilting-weaving demonstrations provided by local Jody Bates, director of the exhibit, said the exhibit will recreate a period Brazos Valley homestead.

"We would like to encourage the residents of Brazos Valley to donate any historical artifacts dealing with agriculture for display in the exhibition," Bates said. Intended as an educational experience, the exhibit expects to hold tours for 400 local elementary school children, besides being open free to the public.

Texas A&M agricultural history students from Dr. Henry Dethloff's agricultural history classes will act as tour guides for the school children who visit the exhibit. "I decided it would be a good opportunity for a class project after hearing about the exhibit," Dethloff said. elementary school children, and helping exhibit itself on Oct. 20," Dethloff said. record with the collection of 2,180

The previous record for the Blood Drive was set last spring when over 1,700 pints were collected. "We went significantly over our expecta-tions," said Matt Woodruff, chairman of the Aggie Blood Drive committee. "We exceeded the capacity of the drive.

The capacity of the facilities of the Wadley Central Blood Bank set up in the Memorial Student Center and at two bloodmobiles was set at 2,300. Woodruff said this number included both donors and deferrals — those who apply to give but are turned away for medical reasons or because they do not meet the requirements. In addition to the 2,180 pints given, over 2,500 people tried to give blood and couldn't, Woodruff said.
