Student polls show anti-Carter leanings

Mock elections and informal polls in colleges, high schools and junior highs show many of the nation's youth leaning toward John Anderson and Ronald Reagan.

In the Northeast, Anderson's support is coming out tops in college polls, with Carter second and Reagan third. In the South, a college poll puts Reagan in the number one spot.

Typical of college results, Yale Daily News report that 43 percent prefer Anderson, 27 percent prefer Carter and 14 percent prefer Reagan. But when asked "who would you vote for," 43 percent of the students leaned to Carter, 23 percent to Anderson and 17 percent to Reagan.

Joe Wright, editor of the Northeastern University student newspaper, said letters on the election running heavily against Reagan. "The impression seems to be that Reagan will get us into war," Wright said.

But in the opinion of high school students in a nationwide mock election, Reagan will win the election over Carter Tuesday by 276,000 votes to 262,000.

The opinions of high school students were gathered under the auspices of the Parent Participation Workshop funded by a grant from NBC. In the opinion of the poll, Carter will win the election in close states of New York, Mississippi, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Reagan will take Texas, Michigan and New Jersey. The largest college sampling reported in "The Daily Princetonian" — student paper at Princeton, N.J. — asked 2,500 at Cornell, Brown, University of Pennsylvania and Princeton how they would vote. Anderson got 41 percent, Carter 29 percent and Reagan 30 percent.

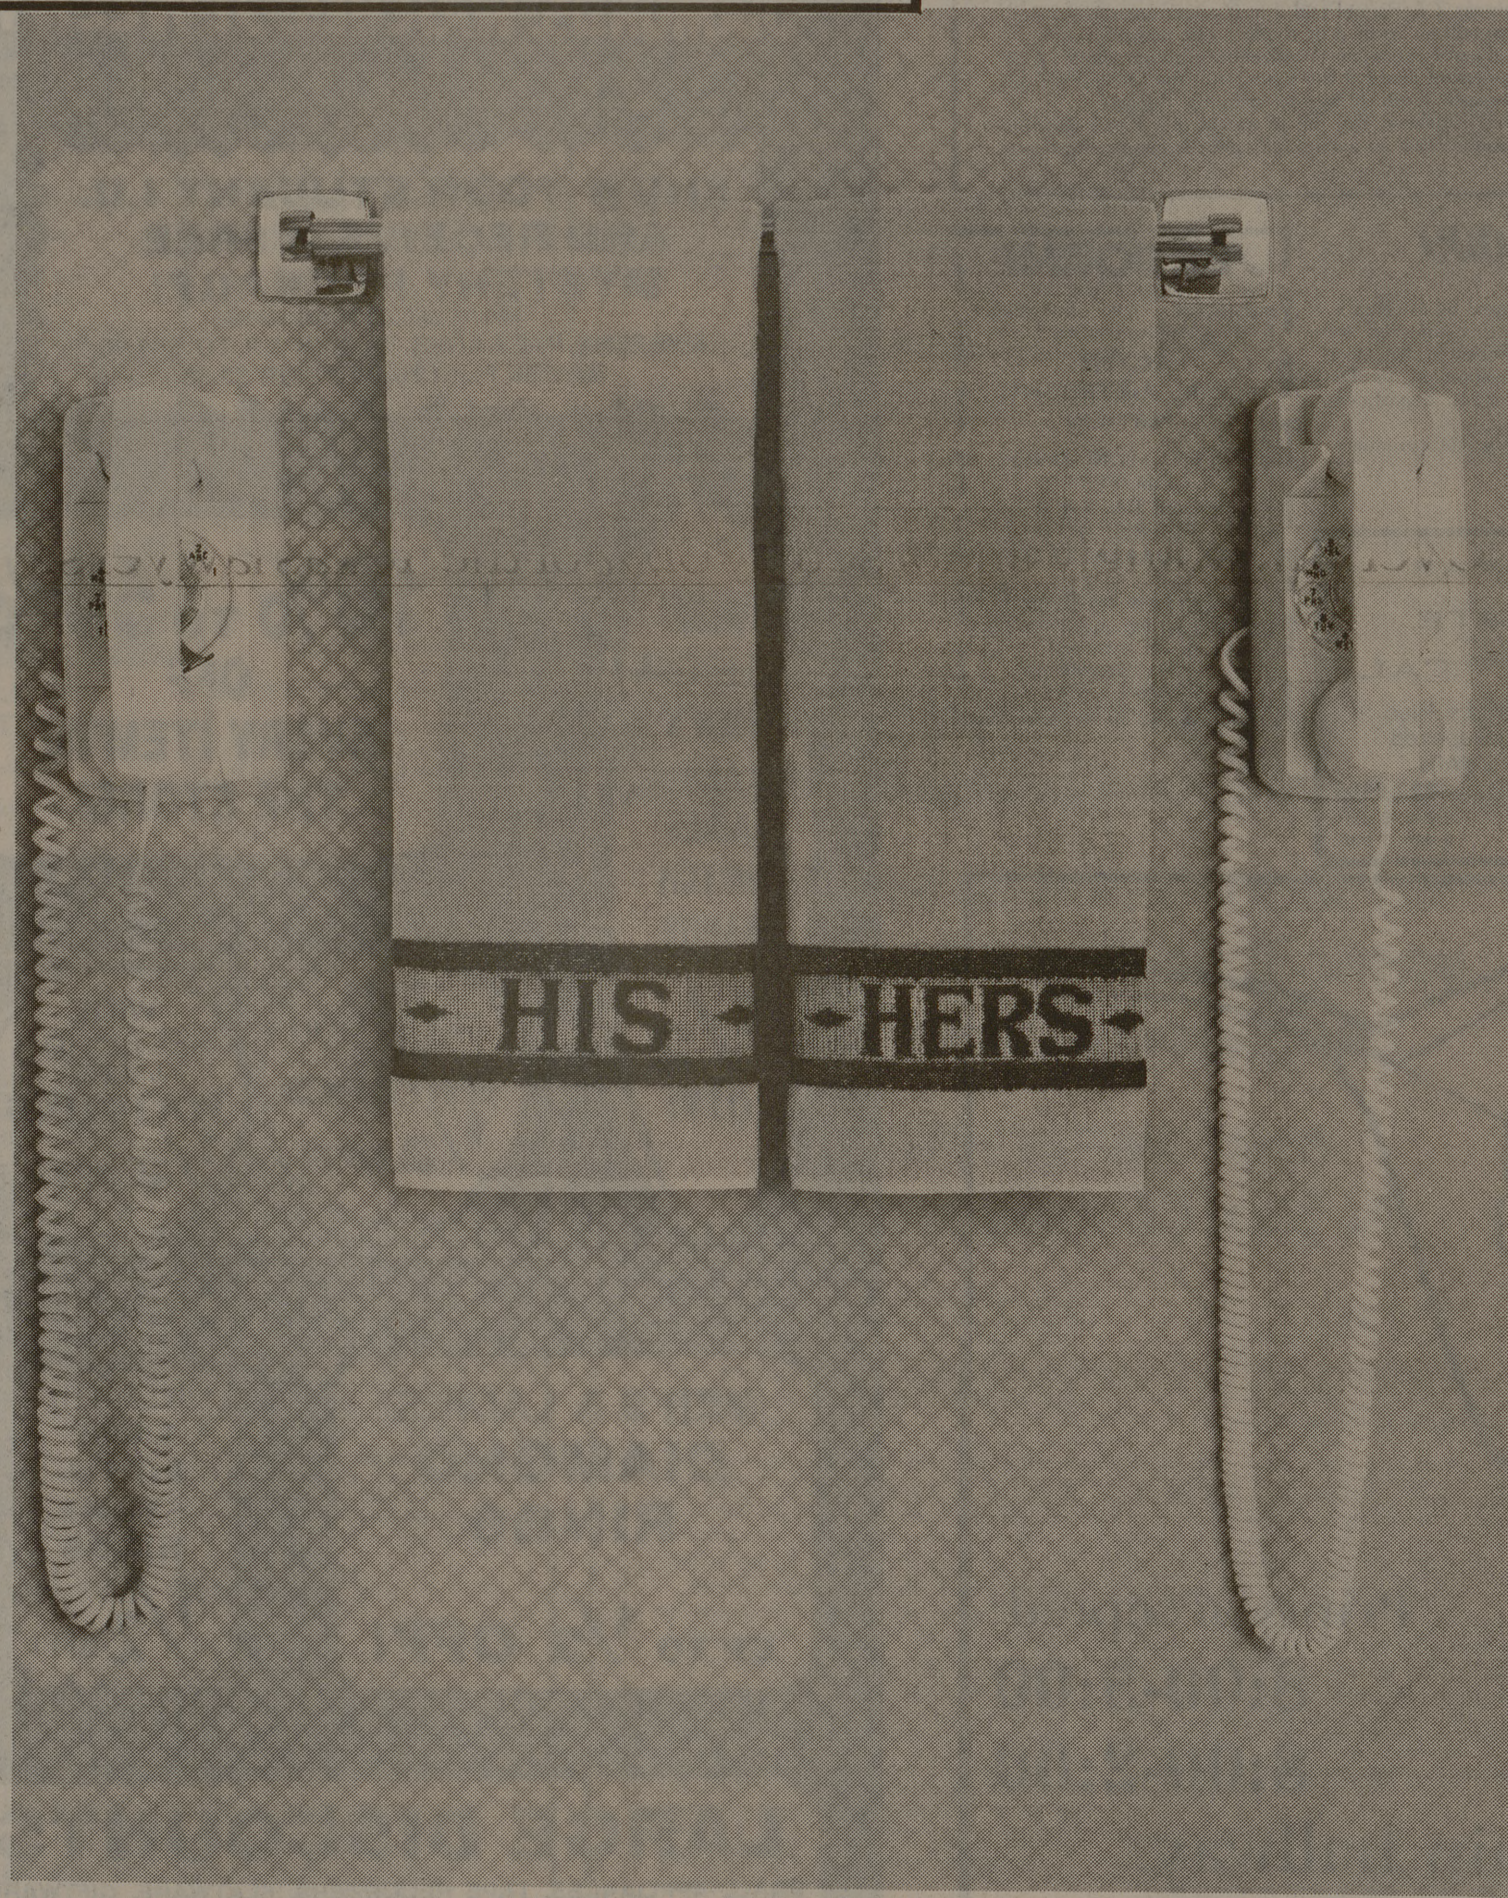

Polls on some campuses in the South, by contrast, show Reagan ahead. According to the Chronicle of Higher Education, Reagan was favorite at Old Dominion University, Radford College, Louisiana State University and Southern Methodist University.
