Polish joke leaves Illinois TA jobless

CHAMPAIGN — URBANA, Ill. — A University of Illinois teaching assistant lost his job recently for telling a Polish joke to relieve tension before a mid-term exam.

Standing before a finance class, TA Bob Moreland dropped his pants and pulled up his socks from the inside to answer his rhetorical question, "How does a Pollock pull up his socks?"

The class instructor didn't find Moreland's actions amusing, however, as he dismissed the teaching assistant from his class and moved him to a research position, citing his behavior at the mid-term as the reason for the change. — Collegiate Headlines

ROTC member won't register for the draft

IOWA CITY, Iowa — No one knows the number of young men who didn't register for the draft as a matter of principle.

But at the University of Iowa, at least one young man falls into that category — even though he's a member of the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) and plans to make the Army his career.

Randy Grant, a UI junior, didn't register because he believes the draft is immoral. "It's a form of slavery or involuntary servitude ... I believe it's wrong to force someone to fight in a war, to force someone to do anything against his will," he says.

Those beliefs don't interfere with his membership in ROTC or with his commitment to the Army after graduation, says Grant. His views about the draft are simply a part of his Libertarian philosophy. As founder of the Hawkeye Libertarians, he is committed enough to his principles to go on record in the UI student newspaper — even though such a public statement could lead to a confrontation with the Selective Service in October, when the agency begins contacting those 19- and 20-year-old men who didn't register.
