Moral Majority statements trouble Rosalynn Carter

United Press International
WASHINGTON — Rosalynn Carter says she is troubled by the Moral Majority and painfully recalls a TV evangelist saying the day after her husband's election defeat, "They got the evil people out of the White House."

Speaking of the political involvement of the ultraconservative Christian movement, Mrs. Carter said, "It had an impact on Ronald Reagan's victory."

The first lady made the remark during an informal news conference. She appeared relaxed and reconciled to President Carter's loss.

But about the Moral Majority, a group of fundamentalist Christians seeking to influence government policy, Mrs. Carter said, "I am concerned about them."

"The day after the election this evangelist was saying on television, 'They got the evil people out of the White House. God's people will eventually be in control.'"

"That bothers me," she said, adding that "liberal" was equated with "communist" and "socialist" by the same preacher.

She admits she "cried a little bit" on Election Day and "I've had some weak and painful moments."

She recalled she and the president returned to the White House after voting in Plains, Ga., on election day and, in an emotional reunion, told wet-eyed family and friends Carter would lose the election.

"Then I went into my room and cried a little bit but I came right out and that was it," Mrs. Carter said.

As for the future, she said she will go home to Plains and plans to write a book and will continue to speak out on the issues she believes in.

"You go from one phase of your life to the next phase of life," she said. "I think it's going to be exciting."

As for seeking political office, she shrugged off the idea but did not rule it out in the future.

Asked if Reagan would be able to carry out his campaign promises, Mrs. Carter said, "I don't know. That's up to him."

"What I'm saying is that he is already doing. But I don't think people are aware of that. When you come here you realize, it is very hard to say things you are going to do. How you are going to cure all the problems, but the problems are so many and they don't go away overnight. It takes time to solve them."

Of charges that her husband is incompetent as president, Mrs. Carter said: "That is not true. I think people were frustrated. I think a protest vote. I do not think the rejection of Jimmy Carter. There was a protest vote against the nation — inflation, the Iranian situation that came up."

Amy, who popped in during the interview, said she would miss friends the most when she leaves the White House.

General store sells history

United Press International
CAMP VERDE, Texas — The Camp Verde General Store, a kind of drive-in museum, is dedicated not only to dispensing sardines, gasoline, Coca-Cola and camera film, but to preserving Hill Country folkways and the history of one of the most unique — some say harebrained — experiments ever conducted by the U.S. government.

The scheme involved camels, and though the desert beasts have been dead for more than a century, the store lived on, providing a spot for settlers and visitors to shop, tell stories and visit.

In 1856, Camp Verde was the holding pen for 40 camels sent by Secretary of War Jefferson Davis to be used in a planned system of overland communication. The idea was that the camels would thrive in west and south Texas because of their ability to keep traveling with a minimum of water and food.

With the camels came soldiers, and Camp Verde General Store was established to cater to their needs.

The outcome of the camel experiment is sketchy; it is debatable whether the scheme flopped or was interrupted by the Civil War. At any rate, the post was surrendered to the Confederate government in 1861, reoccupied by U.S. troops in 1865 and abandoned April 1, 1869.

But the store stayed on, serving the pioneer ranchers of southern Kerr County as a post office, meeting hall and central larder.

The latest in a long line of proprietors are Joyce and Roland Walters, who have enjoyed some success at deferring to history and selling groceries at the same time.

Every summer the grounds of the old fort are invaded by armies of tourists who like to extend their forays into the past to the shelves of the store, which stocks an upstairs gallery with arts and crafts — dolls, ceramics, candles — constructed with decades-old Texas knowhow.

"It surprises me the publicity the store has received," Mrs. Walters said recently. But she was quick to point out that the business is "in its own little town, with its own little history."

That 124-year history includes a turn-of-the-century flood that swept away the original store building, a new two-story stone structure in the southern colonial design was built within six months after the flood, and is the store that stands today; three miles from Camp Verde, near the intersection of Highway 173 and Farm Road 173, fifty yards behind the store is a Verdi Creek, providing a view of red rocks along the creek bank.

"The trees are all turning brown now; it's really pretty," Mrs. Brandon, one of the three who operate the store on a regular schedule, said on an afternoon morning.

Brandon, Polly McClure and Walters keep the business open from 8:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. six days a week and from noon to 5:30 p.m. on Sundays.

The store is still pretty green providing a regular line of groceries and some household items such as sardines, canned goods and crockery to the ranchers. Although it does not handle ranching supplies or hardware, it does carry a few fishing boats, hooks and lines.

Merchant sells bread for a nickel

United Press International
SIOUX CITY, Iowa — Hundreds of shoppers crowded a local market to cash in on the latest of a two-week price war — a loaf of bread.

Fred Wickman, manager of Food 4 Less store, said he reduced the price on bread Tuesday in competition.

Wickman said the last time a loaf cost a nickel was in 1958.
