1969 death might be toxic shock

HOUSTON — Bacteria found in the body of heiress Joan Robinson Hill, whose mysterious death in 1969 led to a book and now a television movie, tends to indicate that she did not die of toxic shock syndrome, medical examiner says.
Hill died at age 35 of what was then ruled a massive infection. In three-day illness, she suffered vomiting, diarrhea, high fever and drop in blood pressure. Toxic shock syndrome was unknown at the time.
Her husband, Dr. John Hill, was prosecuted for alleged murder of his first wife by neglect but his first trial ended in mistrial. He was then to death in a 1972 contract killing before he could be retried.
A third Mrs. Hill filed a civil suit trying to link Joan Robinson Hill father, oilman Ash Robinson, to the killing of the husband, but a jury cleared him.
"It (Mrs. Hill's death) doesn't fit the pattern, in my opinion," the County Medical Examiner Dr. Joseph Jachimczyk said. "There was demonstrable significant bacteria growth that is present in the toxic shock syndrome."
CBS-TV News Saturday quoted John Hill's defense lawyer, Richard "Racehorse" Haynes, as saying he believed toxic shock syndrome killed Mrs. Hill.
The network also quoted Dr. Paul Radclat, who participated in an exhumation autopsy on Mrs. Hill, as saying she might have died of toxic shock syndrome, although he said it could not be known with certain.
Jachimczyk agreed Hill had some symptoms but not others. He said toxic shock victims have gram positive bacteria in their bodies. Hill had gram negative bacteria in her body.
